Amdt14.S1.8.13.1 Overview of Fundamental Rights

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 1:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The other phase of active review of classifications holds that when certain fundamental liberties and interests are involved, government classifications which adversely affect them must be justified by a showing of a compelling interest necessitating the classification and by a showing that the distinctions are required to further the governmental purpose. The effect of applying the test, as in the other branch of active review, is to deny to legislative judgments the deference usually accorded them and to dispense with the general presumption of constitutionality usually given state classifications.<sup>1</sup>

It is thought<sup>2</sup> that the “fundamental right” theory had its origins in Skinner v. Oklahoma ex rel. Williamson,<sup>3</sup> in which the Court subjected to “strict scrutiny” a state statute providing for compulsory sterilization of habitual criminals, such scrutiny being thought necessary because the law affected “one of the basic civil rights.” In the apportionment decisions, Chief Justice Earl Warren observed that, “since the right to exercise the franchise in a free and unimpaired manner is preservative of other basic civil and political rights, any alleged infringement of the right of citizens to vote must be carefully and meticulously scrutinized.”<sup>4</sup> A stiffening of the traditional test could be noted in the opinion of the Court striking down certain restrictions on voting eligibility<sup>5</sup> and the phrase “compelling state interest” was used several times in Justice William Brennan’s opinion in Shapiro v. Thompson.<sup>6</sup> Thereafter, the phrase was used in several voting cases in which restrictions were voided, and the doctrine was asserted in other cases.<sup>7</sup>

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—EQUAL PROTECTION AND OTHER RIGHTS

Sec. 1—Rights: Equal Protection, Fundamental Rights

Amdt14.S1.8.13.1
Overview of Fundamental Rights

Although no opinion of the Court attempted to delineate the process by which certain “fundamental” rights were differentiated from others,<sup>8</sup> it was evident from the cases that the right to vote,<sup>9</sup> the right of interstate travel,<sup>10</sup> the right to be free of wealth distinctions in the criminal process,<sup>11</sup> and the right of procreation<sup>12</sup> were at least some of those interests that triggered active review when de jure or de facto official distinctions were made with respect to them. In Rodriguez,<sup>13</sup> the Court also sought to rationalize and restrict this branch of active review, as that case involved both a claim that de facto wealth classifications should be suspect and a claim that education was a fundamental interest, so that providing less of it to people because they were poor triggered a compelling state interest standard. The Court readily agreed that education was an important value in our society. “But the importance of a service performed by the State does not determine whether it must be regarded as fundamental for purposes of examination under the Equal Protection Clause. . . . [T]he answer lies in assessing whether there is a right to education explicitly or implicitly guaranteed by the Constitution.”<sup>14</sup> A right to education is not expressly protected by the Constitution, continued the Court, and it was unwilling to find an implied right because of its undoubted importance.

But just as Rodriguez did not ultimately prevent the Court’s adoption of a “three-tier” or “sliding-tier” standard of review, Justice Lewis Powell’s admonition that only interests expressly or impliedly protected by the Constitution should be considered “fundamental” did not prevent the expansion of the list of such interests. The difficulty was that Court decisions on the right to vote, the right to travel, the right to procreate, as well as other rights, premise the constitutional violation to be of the Equal Protection Clause, which does not itself guarantee the right but prevents the differential governmental treatment of those attempting to exercise the right.<sup>15</sup> Thus, state limitation on the entry into marriage was soon denominated an incursion on a fundamental right that required a compelling justification.<sup>16</sup> Although denials of public funding of abortions were because only poor held to implicate no fundamental interest—abortion’s being a fundamental interest—and no suspect classification—because only poor women needed public funding<sup>17</sup> other denials of public assistance because of alienage, sex, or whether a person was born out of wedlock have been deemed to be governed by the same standard of review as affirmative harms imposed on those grounds.<sup>18</sup> And, in Plyler v. Doe,<sup>19</sup> the complete denial of education to the children of unlawfully present aliens was found subject to intermediate scrutiny and invalidated.

An open question after Obergefell v. Hodges, the 2015 case finding the right to same-sex marriage is protected by the Constitution, is the extent to which the Court is reconceptualizing equal protection analysis.<sup>20</sup> In Obergefell, the Court concluded that state laws that distinguished between marriages between same- and opposite-sex married couples violated the Equal Protection Clause.<sup>21</sup> However, in lieu of more traditional equal protection analysis, the Obergefell Court did not identify whether the base classification made by the challenged state marriage laws was “suspect.” Nor did the Obergefell Court engage in a balancing test to determine whether the purpose of the state classification was tailored to or fit the contours of the classification. Instead, the Court merely declared that state laws prohibiting same-sex marriage “abridge[d] central precepts of equality.”<sup>22</sup> It remains to be seen whether Obergefell signals a new direction for the Court’s equal protection jurisprudence or is merely an anomaly that indicates the fluctuating nature of active review, as the doctrine has been subject to shifting majorities and varying degrees of concern about judicial activism and judicial restraint. Nonetheless, as will be more fully reviewed below, the sliding scale of review underlies many of the Court’s most recent equal protection cases, even if the jurisprudence and its doctrinal basis have not been fully elucidated or consistently endorsed by the Court.

Amdt14.S1.8.13.2 Interstate Travel as a Fundamental Right

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 1:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The doctrine of the “right to travel” actually encompasses three separate rights, of which two have been notable for the uncertainty of their textual support. The first is the right of a citizen to move freely between states, a right venerable for its longevity, but still lacking a clear doctrinal basis.<sup>1</sup> The second, expressly addressed by the first sentence of Article IV, provides a citizen of one state who is temporarily visiting another state the “Privileges and Immunities” of a citizen of the latter state.<sup>2</sup> The third is the right of a new arrival to a state, who establishes citizenship in that state, to enjoy the same rights and benefits as other state citizens. This right is most often invoked in challenges to durational residency requirements, which require that persons reside in a state for a specified period before taking advantage of the benefits of that state’s citizenship.

enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Challenges to durational residency requirements have traditionally been made under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In 1999, however, the Court approved a doctrinal shift, so that state laws that distinguished between their own citizens, based on how long they had been in the state, would be evaluated instead under the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.<sup>1</sup> The Court did not, however, question the continuing efficacy of the earlier cases.

A durational residency requirement creates two classes of persons: those who have been within the state for the prescribed period and those who have not.<sup>2</sup> But persons who have moved recently, at least from state to state,<sup>3</sup> have exercised a right protected by the Constitution, and the durational residency classification either deters the exercise of that right or penalizes those who have exercised it.<sup>4</sup> Any such classification is invalid “unless shown to be necessary to promote a compelling governmental interest.”<sup>5</sup> The constitutional right to travel has long been recognized,<sup>6</sup> but it is only relatively recently that the strict standard of equal protection review has been applied to nullify durational residency requirements.

Thus, in Shapiro v. Thompson,<sup>7</sup> durational residency requirements conditioning eligibility for welfare assistance on one year’s residence in the state<sup>8</sup> were voided. If the purpose of the requirements was to inhibit migration by needy persons into the state or to bar the entry of those who came from low-paying states to higher-paying ones in order to collect greater benefits, the Court said, the purpose was impermissible.<sup>9</sup> If, on the other hand, the purpose was to serve certain administrative and related governmental objectives—the facilitation of the planning of budgets, the provision of an objective test of residency, minimization of opportunity

<sup>3</sup> Intrastate travel is protected to the extent that the classification fails to meet equal protection standards in some respect. Compare Hadnott v. Amos, 320 F. for fraud, and encouragement of early entry of new residents into the labor force—then the requirements were rationally related to the purpose but they were not compelling enough to justify a classification that infringed a fundamental interest.<sup>10</sup> In Dunn v. Blumstein,<sup>11</sup> where the durational residency requirements denied the franchise to newcomers, such administrative justifications were found constitutionally insufficient to justify the classification.<sup>12</sup> The Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was the basis for striking down a California law that limited welfare benefits for California citizens who had resided in the state for less than a year to the level of benefits that they would have received in the state of their prior residence.<sup>13</sup>

However, a state one-year durational residency requirement for the initiation of a divorce proceeding was sustained in Sosna v. Iowa.<sup>14</sup> Although it is not clear what the precise basis of the ruling is, it appears that the Court found that the state’s interest in requiring that those who seek a divorce from its courts be genuinely attached to the state and its desire to insulate divorce decrees from the likelihood of collateral attack justified the requirement.<sup>15</sup> Similarly, durational residency requirements for lower in-state tuition at public colleges have been held constitutionally justifiable, again, however, without a clear statement of reason.<sup>16</sup> More recently, the Court has attempted to clarify these cases by distinguishing situations where a state citizen is likely to “consume” benefits within a state’s borders (such as the provision of welfare) from those where citizens of other states are likely to establish residency just long enough to acquire some portable benefit, and then return to their original domicile to enjoy them (such as obtaining a divorce decree or paying the in-state tuition rate for a college education).<sup>17</sup>

A state scheme for returning to its residents a portion of the income earned from the vast oil deposits discovered within Alaska foundered upon the formula for allocating the dividends; that is, each adult resident received one unit of return for each year of residency subsequent to 1959, the first year of Alaska’s statehood. The law thus created fixed, permanent distinctions between an ever-increasing number of classes of bona fide residents based on how long they had been in the state. The differences between the durational residency cases previously

When Connecticut and New York reinstated the requirements, pleading a financial emergency as the compelling state interest, they were summarily rebuffed. Rivera v. Dunn, 329 F. Supp. 554 (D. But the Court also indicated that the plaintiff was not absolutely barred from the state courts, but merely required to wait for access (which was true in the prior cases as well and there held immaterial), and that possibly the state interests in marriage and divorce were more exclusive and thus more immune from federal constitutional attack than were the matters at issue in the previous cases. The Court also did not indicate whether it was using strict or traditional scrutiny.

decided did not alter the bearing of the right to travel principle upon the distribution scheme, but the Court's decision went off on the absence of any permissible purpose underlying the apportionment classification and it thus failed even the rational basis test.<sup>18</sup>

Still unresolved are issues such as durational residency requirements for occupational licenses and other purposes.<sup>19</sup> But this line of cases does not apply to state residency requirements themselves, as distinguished from durational provisions,<sup>20</sup> and the cases do not inhibit the states when, having reasons for doing so, they bar travel by certain persons.<sup>21</sup>

SECTION 2—APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION

Amdt14.S2.1 Overview of Apportionment of Representation

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 2:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

With the abolition of slavery by the Thirteenth Amendment, enslaved persons and their descendants, who formerly counted as three-fifths of a person, would be fully counted in the apportionment of seats in the House of Representatives, increasing as well the electoral vote, and there appeared the prospect that the readmitted Southern states would gain a political advantage in Congress when combined with Democrats from the North. Because the South was adamantly opposed to African American suffrage, all the congressmen would be elected by White voters. Many wished to provide for the enfranchisement of African Americans and proposals to this effect were voted on in both the House and the Senate, but only a few Northern states permitted African Americans to vote, and a series of referenda on the question in Northern states revealed substantial White hostility to the proposal. Therefore, a compromise was worked out to effect a reduction in the representation of any state that discriminated against males in the franchise.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55 (1982). Somewhat similar was the Court's invalidation on equal protection grounds of a veterans preference for state employment limited to persons who were state residents when they entered military service; four Justices also thought the preference penalized the right to travel. Attorney General of New York v. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898 (1986).

<sup>19</sup> La Tourette v. McMaster, 248 U.S. 465 (1919), upholding a two-year residence requirement to become an insurance broker, must be considered of questionable validity. Durational periods for admission to the practice of law or medicine or other professions have evoked differing responses by lower courts.

<sup>20</sup> E.g., McCarthy v. Philadelphia Civil Service Comm'n, 424 U.S. 645 (1976) (ordinance requiring city employees to be and to remain city residents upheld). See Memorial Hospital v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 255 (1974). See also Martinez v. Bynum, 461 U.S. 321 (1983) (bona fide residency requirement for free tuition to public schools).

Sec. 2—Apportionment of Representation

Amdt14.S2.1

Overview of Apportionment of Representation

No serious effort was ever made in Congress to effectuate Section 2, and the only judicial attempt was rebuffed.<sup>2</sup> With subsequent constitutional amendments adopted and the use of federal coercive powers to enfranchise persons, the section is little more than a historical curiosity.<sup>3</sup>

However, in Richardson v. Ramirez,<sup>4</sup> the Court relied upon the implied approval of disqualification upon conviction of crime to uphold a state law disqualifying convicted felons for the franchise even after the service of their terms. It declined to assess the state interests involved and to evaluate the necessity of the rule, holding rather that because of Section 2 the Equal Protection Clause was simply inapplicable.

SECTION 3—DISQUALIFICATION FROM HOLDING OFFICE

Amdt14.S3.1 Overview of Disqualification Clause

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 3:

No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may by a vote of two-thirds of each House, remove such disability.

The right to remove disabilities imposed by this Section was exercised by Congress at different times on behalf of enumerated individuals.<sup>1</sup> In 1872, the disabilities were removed, by a blanket act, from all persons “except Senators and Representatives of the Thirty-sixth and Thirty-seventh Congresses, officers in the judicial, military and naval service of the United States, heads of departments, and foreign ministers of the United States.”<sup>2</sup> Twenty-six years later, Congress enacted that “the disability imposed by section 3 . . . incurred heretofore, is hereby removed.”<sup>3</sup>

<sup>3</sup> The Section did furnish a basis to Justice John Harlan to argue that inasmuch as Section 2 recognized a privilege to discriminate subject only to the penalty provided, the Court was in error in applying Section 1 to questions relating to the franchise. *Compare Oregon v. Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5:

The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

In the aftermath of the Civil War, Congress, in addition to proposing to the states the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments, enacted seven statutes designed in a variety of ways to implement the provisions of these Amendments.<sup>1</sup> Several of these laws were general civil rights statutes that broadly attacked racial and other discrimination on the part of private individuals and groups as well as by the states, but the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional or rendered ineffective practically all of these laws over the course of several years.<sup>2</sup> In the end, Reconstruction was abandoned and with rare exceptions no cases were brought under the remaining statutes until fairly recently.<sup>3</sup> Beginning with the Civil Rights Act of 1957, however, Congress generally acted pursuant to its powers under the Commerce Clause<sup>4</sup> until Supreme Court decisions indicated an expansive concept of congressional power under the Civil War Amendments,<sup>5</sup> which culminated in broad provisions against private interference with civil rights in the 1968 legislation.<sup>6</sup>

Amdt14.S5.2 Who Congress May Regulate

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5:

The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

In enforcing by appropriate legislation the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees against state denials, Congress has the discretion to adopt remedial measures, such as authorizing persons being denied their civil rights in state courts to remove their cases to federal courts,<sup>1</sup> and to provide criminal<sup>2</sup> and civil<sup>3</sup> liability for state officials and agents<sup>4</sup> or persons associated with them<sup>5</sup> who violate protected rights. These statutory measures designed to eliminate discrimination “under color of law”<sup>6</sup> present no problems of constitutional foundation, although there may well be other problems of application.<sup>7</sup> But the Reconstruction Congresses did not stop with statutory implementation of rights guaranteed against state infringement, moving as well against private interference.

Thus, in the Civil Rights Act of 1875<sup>8</sup> Congress had proscribed private racial discrimination in the admission to and use of inns, public conveyances, theaters, and other places of public amusement. The Civil Rights Cases<sup>9</sup> found this enactment to be beyond Congress’s power to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court observed that Section 1 prohibited only state action and did not reach private conduct. Therefore, Congress’s power under Section 5 to enforce Section 1 by appropriate legislation was held to be similarly limited. “It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation; but to provide modes of relief against State legislation, or State action, of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights; but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws, and the action of State officers executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment.”<sup>10</sup> The holding in this case had already been preceded by United States v. Cruikshank<sup>11</sup> and by United States v. Harris<sup>12</sup> in which the Federal Government had prosecuted individuals for killing and injuring African Americans. The Amendment did not increase the power of the Federal Government vis-a-vis individuals, the Court held, only with regard to the states themselves.<sup>13</sup>

Cruikshank did, however, recognize a small category of federal rights that Congress could protect against private deprivation, rights that the Court viewed as deriving particularly from one’s status as a citizen of the United States and that Congress had a general police power to protect.<sup>14</sup> These rights included the right to vote in federal elections, general and primary,<sup>15</sup> the right to federal protection while in the custody of federal officers,<sup>16</sup> and the right to inform federal officials of violations of federal law.<sup>17</sup> The right of interstate travel is a basic right derived from the Federal Constitution, which Congress may protect.<sup>18</sup> In United States v. Williams,<sup>19</sup> in the context of state action, the Court divided 4-4 over whether the predecessor of 18 U.S.C. § 241 in its reference to a “right or privilege secured . . . by the Constitution or laws of the United States” encompassed rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment, or was restricted to those rights “which Congress can beyond doubt constitutionally secure against interference by private individuals.” This issue was again reached in United States v. Price<sup>20</sup> and United States v. Guest,<sup>21</sup> again in the context of state action, in which the Court concluded that the statute included within its scope rights guaranteed by the Due Process and Equal Protection Clauses.

Because the Court found that both Price and Guest concerned sufficient state action, it did not then have to reach the question of Section 241’s constitutionality when applied to private action that interfered with rights not the subject of a general police power. But Justice William Brennan, responding to what he apparently interpreted as language in the Court’s opinion construing Congress’s power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to be limited by the state action requirement, appended a lengthy statement, which a majority of the Justices joined, arguing that Congress’s power was broader.<sup>22</sup> “Although the Fourteenth Amendment itself . . . ‘speaks to the State or to those acting under the color of its authority,’ legislation protecting rights created by that Amendment, such as the right to equal utilization of state facilities, need not be confined to punishing conspiracies in which state officers participate. Rather, Section 5 authorizes Congress to make laws that it concludes are reasonably necessary to protect a right created by and arising under that Amendment; and Congress is thus fully empowered to determine that punishment of private conspiracies interfering with the exercise of such a right is necessary to its full protection.”<sup>23</sup> The Justice throughout the opinion refers to “Fourteenth Amendment rights,” by which he meant rights that, in the words of 18 U.S.C. § 241, are “secured . . . by the Constitution,” that is, by the Fourteenth Amendment through prohibitory words addressed only to governmental officers. Thus, the Equal Protection Clause commands that all “public facilities owned or operated by or on behalf of the State,” be available equally to all persons; that access is a right granted by the Constitution, and Section 5 is viewed “as a positive grant of legislative power, authorizing Congress to exercise its discretion in fashioning remedies to achieve civil and political equality for all citizens.” Within this discretion is the “power to determine that in order adequately to protect the right to equal utilization of state facilities, it is also appropriate to punish other individuals” who would deny such access.<sup>24</sup>

The Court, however, ultimately rejected this expansion of the powers of Congress in United States v. Morrison.<sup>25</sup> In Morrison, the Court invalidated a provision of the Violence Against Women Act<sup>26</sup> that established a federal civil remedy for victims of gender-motivated violence. The case involved a university student who brought a civil action against other students who allegedly raped her. The argument was made that there was a pervasive bias against victims of gender-motivated violence in state justice systems, and that the federal remedy would offset and deter this bias. The Court first reaffirmed the state action requirement for legislation passed under the Fourteenth Amendment,<sup>27</sup> dismissing the dicta in Guest, and reaffirming the precedents of the Civil Rights Cases and United States v. Harris. The Court also rejected the assertion that the legislation was “corrective” of bias in the courts, as the suits are not directed at the state or any state actor, but rather at the individuals committing the criminal acts.<sup>28</sup>

<sup>28</sup> This holding may have broader significance for federal civil rights law. For instance, 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3) (a civil statute paralleling the criminal statute held unconstitutional in United States v. Harris) lacks a “color of law” requirement. Although the requirement was read into it in Collins v. Hardyman, 341 U.S. 651 (1951), to avoid constitutional problems, it was read out again in Griffin v. Breckenridge, 403 U.S. 88, 97 (1971) (although it might be “difficult to conceive of what might constitute a deprivation of the equal protection of the laws by private persons . . . there is nothing inherent in the phrase that requires the action working the deprivation to come from the State”). What the unanimous Court held in Griffin was that an “intent to deprive of equal protection, or equal privileges and immunities, means that there must be some racial, or perhaps otherwise class-based, invidiously discriminatory animus behind the conspirators’ action.” Id. at 102. As so construed, the statute was held constitutional as applied in the complaint before the Court on the basis of the Thirteenth Amendment and the right to travel; there was no necessity therefore, to consider Congress’s powers under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. Id. at 107.

Pre-Modern Doctrine on Enforcement Clause

Amdt14.S5.3 Pre-Modern Doctrine on Enforcement Clause

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5:

The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

In the Civil Rights Cases,<sup>1</sup> the Court observed that “the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation,” that is, laws to counteract and overrule those state laws that Section 1 forbids the states to adopt. The Court was quite clear that, under its responsibilities of judicial review, it was the body that would determine that a state law was impermissible and that a federal law passed pursuant to Section 5 was necessary and proper to enforce Section 1.<sup>2</sup> But, in United States v. Guest,<sup>3</sup> Justice William Brennan protested that this view “attributes a far too limited objective to the Amendment’s sponsors,” that in fact “the primary purpose of the Amendment was to augment the power of Congress, not the judiciary.”

In Katzenbach v. Morgan,<sup>4</sup> Justice William Brennan, this time speaking for the Court, in effect overrode the limiting view and posited a doctrine by which Congress was to define the substance of what the legislation enacted pursuant to Section 5 must be appropriate to. That is, in upholding the constitutionality of a provision of the Voting Rights Act of 1965<sup>5</sup> barring the application of English literacy requirements to a certain class of voters, the Court rejected a state argument “that an exercise of congressional power under § 5 . . . that prohibits the enforcement of a state law can only be sustained if the judicial branch determines that the state law is prohibited by the provisions of the Amendment that Congress sought to enforce.”<sup>6</sup> Because the Court had previously upheld an English literacy requirement under equal protection challenge,<sup>7</sup> acceptance of the argument would have doomed the federal law. But, said Justice William Brennan, Congress itself might have questioned the justifications put forward by the state in defense of its law and might have concluded that, instead of being supported by acceptable reasons, the requirements were unrelated to those justifications and discriminatory in intent and effect. The Court would not evaluate the competing considerations that might have led Congress to its conclusion; because Congress “brought a specially informed legislative competence” to an appraisal of voting requirements, “it was Congress’s prerogative to weigh” the considerations and the Court would sustain the

The lower courts have been quite divided with respect to what constitutes a non-racial, class-based animus, and what constitutional protections must be threatened before a private conspiracy can be reached under § 1985(3). See, e.g., Action v. Gannon, 450 F.2d 1227 (8th Cir. 1971); Dombrowski v. Dowling, 459 F.2d 190 (7th Cir. 1972); Great American Fed. S. & L. Ass’n v. The Court’s decision in Morrison, however, appears to preclude the use of § 1985(3) in relation to Fourteenth Amendment rights absent some state action.

<sup>4</sup> 384 U.S. 641 (1966). Besides the ground of decision discussed here, Morgan also advanced an alternative ground for upholding the statute. That is, Congress might have overridden the state law not because the law itself violated the Equal Protection Clause but because being without the vote meant the class of persons was subject to discriminatory state and local treatment and giving these people the ballot would afford a means of correcting that situation. The statute therefore was an appropriate means to enforce the Equal Protection Clause under “necessary and proper” standards. Id. at 652–653. conclusion if “we perceive a basis upon which Congress might predicate a judgment” that the requirements constituted invidious discrimination.<sup>8</sup>

In dissent, Justice John Harlan protested that “[i]n effect the Court reads § 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment as giving Congress the power to define the substantive scope of the Amendment. If that indeed be the true reach of § 5, then I do not see why Congress should not be able as well to exercise its § 5 ‘discretion’ by enacting statutes so as in effect to dilute equal protection and due process decisions of this Court.”<sup>9</sup> Justice William Brennan rejected this reasoning: “We emphasize that Congress’s power under § 5 is limited to adopting measures to enforce the guarantees of the Amendment; § 5 grants Congress no power to restrict, abrogate, or dilute these guarantees.”<sup>10</sup> Congress responded, however, in both fashions. On the one hand, in the 1968 Civil Rights Act it relied on Morgan in expanding federal powers to deal with private violence that is racially motivated, and to some degree in outlawing most private housing discrimination;<sup>11</sup> on the other hand, it enacted provisions of law purporting to overrule the Court’s expansion of the self-incrimination and right-to-counsel clauses of the Bill of Rights, expressly invoking Morgan.<sup>12</sup>

Congress’s power under Morgan returned to the Court’s consideration when several states challenged congressional legislation<sup>13</sup> lowering the voting age in all elections to eighteen and prescribing residency and absentee voting requirements for the conduct of presidential elections. In upholding the latter provision and in dividing over the former, the Court revealed that Morgan’s vitality was in some considerable doubt, at least with regard to the reach that many observers had previously seen.<sup>14</sup> Four Justices accepted Morgan in full,<sup>15</sup> while one Justice rejected it totally<sup>16</sup> and another would have limited it to racial cases.<sup>17</sup> The other three Justices seemingly restricted Morgan to its alternate rationale in passing on the age reduction provision, but the manner in which they dealt with the residency and absentee voting provision afforded Congress some degree of discretion in making substantive decisions about what state action is discriminatory above and beyond the judicial view of the matter.<sup>18</sup>

More recent decisions read broadly Congress’s power to make determinations that appear to be substantive decisions with respect to constitutional violations.<sup>19</sup> Acting under both the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, Congress has acted to reach state electoral practices that “result” in diluting the voting power of minorities, although the Court apparently requires that it be shown that electoral procedures must have been created or maintained with a discriminatory animus before they may be invalidated under the two Amendments.<sup>20</sup> Moreover, movements have been initiated in Congress by opponents of certain of the Court’s decisions, notably the abortion rulings, to use Section 5 powers to curtail the rights the Court has derived from the Due Process Clause and other provisions of the Constitution.<sup>21</sup>

Amdt14.S5.4 Modern Doctrine on Enforcement Clause

Fourteenth Amendment, Section 5:

The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

City of Boerne v. Flores<sup>1</sup> illustrates that the Court will not always defer to Congress’s determination as to what legislation is appropriate to “enforce” the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Flores, the Court held that the Religious Freedom Restoration Act,<sup>2</sup> which expressly overturned the Court’s narrowing of religious protections under Employment Division v. Smith,<sup>3</sup> exceeded congressional power under Section of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the Court allowed that Congress’s power to legislate to deter or remedy constitutional violations may include prohibitions on conduct that is not itself unconstitutional, the Court also held that there must be “a congruence and proportionality” between the means adopted and the injury to be remedied.<sup>4</sup> Unlike the pervasive suppression of the African American vote in the South that led to the passage of the Voting Rights Act, there was no similar history of religious persecution constituting an “egregious predicate” for the far-reaching provision of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. Also, unlike the Voting Rights Act, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act contained no geographic restrictions or termination dates.<sup>5</sup>

A reinvigorated Eleventh Amendment jurisprudence has led to a spate of decisions applying the principles the Court set forth in Boerne, as litigants precluded from arguing that a state’s sovereign immunity has been abrogated under Article I congressional powers<sup>6</sup> seek alternative legislative authority in Section 5. For instance, in Florida Prepaid Postsecondary Educ. Expense Board v. College Savings Bank,<sup>7</sup> a bank that had patented a financial method designed to guarantee investors sufficient funds to cover the costs of college tuition sued the State of Florida for administering a similar program, arguing that the state’s sovereign immunity had been abrogated by Congress in exercise of its Fourteenth Amendment enforcement power. The Court, however, held that application of the federal patent law to the states was not properly tailored to remedy or prevent due process violations. The Court noted that Congress had identified no pattern of patent infringement by the states, nor a systematic denial of state remedy for such violations such as would constitute a deprivation of property without due process.<sup>8</sup>

A similar result was reached regarding the application of the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) to state agencies in Kimel v. Florida Bd. of Regents.<sup>9</sup> In determining that the Act did not meet the “congruence and proportionality” test, the Court focused not just on whether state agencies had engaged in age discrimination, but on whether states had engaged in unconstitutional age discrimination. This was a particularly difficult test to meet, as the Court has generally rejected constitutional challenges to age discrimination by states, finding that there is a rational basis for states to use age as a proxy for other qualities, abilities, and characteristics.<sup>10</sup> Noting the lack of a sufficient legislative record establishing broad and unconstitutional state discrimination based on age, the Court found that the ADEA, as applied to the states, was “so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that it cannot be understood as responsive to or designed to prevent unconstitutional behavior.”<sup>11</sup>

Despite what was considered by many to be a better developed legislative record, the Court in Board of Trustees of Univ. of Ala. v. Garrett<sup>12</sup> also rejected the recovery of money damages against states, this time under of the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 (ADA).<sup>13</sup> Title I of the ADA prohibits employers, including states, from “discriminating against a qualified individual with a disability”<sup>14</sup> and requires employers to “make reasonable accommodations [for] . . . physical or mental limitations . . . unless [to do so] . . . would impose an undue hardship on the . . . business.”<sup>15</sup> Although the Court had previously overturned discriminatory legislative classifications based on disability in City of Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center,<sup>16</sup> the Court had held that determinations of when states had violated the Equal Protection Clause in such cases were to be made under the relatively deferential standard of rational basis review. Thus, failure of an employer to provide the kind of “reasonable accommodations” required under the ADA would not generally rise to the level of a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and instances of such failures did not qualify as a “history and pattern of unconstitutional employment discrimination.”<sup>17</sup> Thus, according to the Court, not only did the legislative history developed by the Congress not establish a pattern of unconstitutional discrimination against the disabled by states,<sup>18</sup> but the requirements of the ADA would be out of proportion to the alleged offenses.

The Court’s more recent decisions in this area, however, seem to de-emphasize the need for a substantial legislative record when the class being discriminated against is protected by heightened scrutiny of the government’s action. In Nevada Department of Human Resources v. Hibbs,<sup>19</sup> the Court considered the recovery of monetary damages against states under the Family and Medical Leave Act. This Act provides, among other things, that both male and female employees may take up to twelve weeks of unpaid “family care” leave to care for a close relative with a serious health condition. Noting that Section 5 could be used to justify prophylactic legislation, the Court accepted the argument that the Act was intended to prevent gender-based discrimination in the workplace tracing to the historic stereotype that women are the primary caregivers. Congress had documented historical instances of discrimination against women by state governments, and had found that women were provided maternity leave more often than were men.

Although there was a relative absence of proof that states were still engaged in wholesale gender discrimination in employment, the Court distinguished Garrett and Kimel, which had held Congress to a high standard for justifying legislation attempting to remedy classifications subject only to rational basis review. “Because the standard for demonstrating the constitutionality of a gender-based classification is more difficult to meet than our rational basis test . . . it was easier for Congress to show a pattern of state constitutional violations.”<sup>20</sup> Consequently, the Court upheld an across-the-board, routine employment benefit for all eligible employees as a congruent and proportional response to the “state-sanctioned” gender stereotypes.

Nine years after Hibbs, the Court returned to the Family and Medical Leave Act (FMLA), this time to consider the Act’s “self care” (personal medical) leave provisions. There, in Coleman v. Court of Appeals of Md., a four-Justice plurality, joined by concurring Justice Antonin Scalia, found the self care provisions too attenuated from the gender protective roots of the family care provisions to merit heightened consideration.<sup>21</sup> According to the plurality, the self care provisions were intended to ameliorate discrimination based on illness, not sex. The plurality observed that paid sick leave and disability protection were almost universally available to state employees without intended or incidental gender bias. The addition of unpaid self care <sup>18</sup> As Justice Stephen Breyer pointed out in the dissent, however, the Court seemed determined to accord Congress a degree of deference more commensurate with review of an agency action, discounting portions of the legislative history as based on secondary source materials, unsupported by evidence and not relevant to the inquiry at hand.

leave to this state benefit might help some women suffering pregnancy related illness, but the establishment of a broad self care leave program under the FMLA was not a proportional or congruent remedy to protect any constitutionally based right under the circumstances.<sup>22</sup>

The Court in Tennessee v. Lane<sup>23</sup> held that Congress could authorize damage suits against a state for failing to provide disabled persons physical access to its courts. Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) provides that no qualified person shall be excluded or denied the benefits of a public program by reason of a disability,<sup>24</sup> but since disability is not a suspect class, the application of Title II against states would seem questionable under the reasoning of Garrett.<sup>25</sup> Here, however, the Court evaluated the case as a limit on access to court proceedings, which, in some instances, has been held to be a fundamental right subject to heightened scrutiny under the Due Process Clause.<sup>26</sup>

Reviewing the legislative history of the ADA, the Court found that Title II, as applied, was a congruent and proportional response to a Congressional finding of “a backdrop of pervasive unequal treatment in the administration of state services and programs, including systematic deprivations of fundamental rights.”<sup>27</sup> Rather, in an indication of a more robust approach where protection of fundamental rights is at issue, the majority also relied more broadly on a history of state limitations on the rights of the disabled in areas such as marriage or voting, and on limitations of access to public services beyond the use of courts.<sup>28</sup>

Congress’s authority under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to abrogate states’ Eleventh Amendment immunity is strongest when a state’s conduct at issue in a case is alleged to have actually violated a constitutional right. In United States v. Georgia,<sup>29</sup> a disabled state prison inmate who used a wheelchair for mobility alleged that his treatment by the State of Georgia and the conditions of his confinement violated, among other things, Title II of the ADA and the Eighth Amendment (as incorporated by the Fourteenth Amendment). A unanimous Court found that, to the extent that the prisoner’s claims under Title II for money damages were based on conduct that independently violated the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment, they could be applied against the state. In doing so, the Court declined to apply the congruent and proportional response test, distinguishing the cases applying that standard (discussed above) as not generally involving allegations of direct constitutional violations.<sup>30</sup>

<sup>22</sup> Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, writing for herself and three others, extensively reviewed the historical and legislative record and concluded that the family care and the self care provisions were of the same cloth. Both provisions grew out of concern for discrimination against pregnant workers, and, the FMLA’s leave provisions were not, in the dissent’s opinion, susceptible to being rent into separate pieces for analytical purposes.

FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—RIGHT OF CITIZENS TO VOTE

Amdt15.1 Overview of Fifteenth Amendment, Right of Citizens to Vote

The Fifteenth Amendment is the last of the three Civil War Amendments,<sup>1</sup> adopted in response to the end of the American Civil War with the intent to grant the federal government additional powers to address the lingering remnants of slavery.<sup>2</sup> The Fifteenth Amendment addresses the right of suffrage,<sup>3</sup> providing in Section 1 that the right of U.S. citizens to vote may not be abridged by the government “on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.”<sup>4</sup> The Supreme Court recognized as early as 1872 that although the Civil War and responsive Amendments may have been primarily focused on “African slavery,” the protections granted by that text were not limited to those “of African descent.”<sup>5</sup> Describing this provision simply shortly after its adoption, the Supreme Court said “[i]f citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be.”<sup>6</sup> The Court early on also struck down a state law that, although it contained “no word of discrimination on account of race or color,” had the effect of “inherently” making a prior condition of servitude “the controlling and dominant test of the right of suffrage.”<sup>7</sup>

Unlike the guarantees in the original Bill of Rights, the Fifteenth Amendment expressly constrains both “the United States” and “any State” from abridging these rights.<sup>8</sup> The Fifteenth Amendment, with the other Civil War Amendments, thus helped to “fundamentally alter[ ]” the “balance of the pressures of localism and nationalism” by making “civil rights a national concern.”<sup>9</sup> Further, while Section 1’s prohibitions are “self-executing,”<sup>10</sup> Section 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment gives Congress the additional power to pass laws to enforce this guarantee.<sup>11</sup> As the Supreme Court explained in a 2009 opinion, “[t]he first century of congressional enforcement of the Amendment, however, can only be regarded as a failure.”<sup>12</sup> Although federal laws were adopted to enforce the Amendment shortly after ratification, enforcement was “spotty and ineffective,”<sup>13</sup> and ultimately those early laws were “repealed with the rise of Jim Crow.”<sup>14</sup> Finally, Congress adopted the Voting Rights Act of 1965, discussed in more detail in a subsequent essay.<sup>15</sup>

Amdt15.2 Historical Background on Fifteenth Amendment

Fifteenth Amendment:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

In the second session of the Thirty-ninth Congress, Congress extended the right to vote to African American men by statute in the District of Columbia and the territories, and in the seceded states, as a condition of readmission, the states had to guarantee Black men suffrage.<sup>1</sup> Following the election of President Ulysses S. Grant, the “lame duck” third session of the Fortieth Congress passed the amendment on February 26, 1869, and sent the proposed Fifteenth Amendment to the states for ratification. The struggle was intense because Congress was divided into roughly three factions: those who opposed any federal constitutional guarantee of Black male suffrage, those who wanted to go beyond a limited guarantee and enact universal male suffrage, including abolition of all educational and property-holding tests, and those who wanted or who were willing to settle for an amendment merely proscribing racial qualifications in determining who could vote under any other standards the states wished to have.<sup>2</sup> The latter group ultimately prevailed, and the Fifteenth Amendment was ratified by the states on February 3, 1870.<sup>3</sup>

Fifteenth Amendment, Section 1:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—

In its initial interpretations of the Fifteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court emphasized its aspect as a right exempting individuals from voter discrimination, rather than conferring a right to vote. “The Fifteenth Amendment,” it announced, did “not confer the right of suffrage upon any one,” but merely “invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is . . . exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.”<sup>1</sup> In subsequent cases, however, the Court, while conceding that the Amendment may have been originally construed as having been “designed primarily to prevent discrimination,” professed to be able “to see that under some circumstances it may operate as the immediate source of a right to vote.”<sup>2</sup>

Although “the immediate concern of the Amendment was to guarantee to the emancipated slaves the right to vote,” the Court has stated that the Amendment “is cast in fundamental terms, terms transcending the particular controversy,” and “grants protection to all persons, not just members of a particular race.”<sup>3</sup> The Court has construed “race” broadly to include classifications based on ancestry as well as those based on race.<sup>4</sup>

Amdt15.S1.2 Grandfather Clauses

Fifteenth Amendment, Section 1:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—

The history of the Fifteenth Amendment has often been a record of belated judicial condemnation of various state efforts to disenfranchise African Americans, either overtly through statutory enactment or covertly through inequitable administration of electoral laws and toleration of discriminatory practices.<sup>1</sup> One of the first devices declared unconstitutional by the Court was the “grandfather clause.”<sup>2</sup> Beginning in 1895, several states enacted laws in which persons who had been voters or descendants of voters before the ratification of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments could be registered without meeting any literacy requirement. Black voters were therefore unable to avail themselves of the grandfather clause, and then kept from voting on grounds of illiteracy or through discriminatory administration of literacy tests. Meanwhile, illiterate White citizens could register without taking any literacy tests. With the achievement of the intended result, most states permitted these laws to lapse, but the State of Oklahoma’s grandfather clause had been enacted as a permanent amendment to the state constitution.<sup>3</sup> A unanimous Court in the 1915 case Guinn v. United States condemned the device as recreating and perpetuating “the very conditions which the [Fifteenth] Amendment was intended to destroy.”<sup>4</sup>

Sec. 1—Right to Vote

The Court voided a subsequent Oklahoma statute providing that persons who were qualified to vote in 1916, but who failed to register between April 30 and May 11, 1916, should be perpetually disenfranchised.<sup>5</sup> The effect of this statute was that Black voters only had a twenty-day registration opportunity to avoid permanent disenfranchisement by virtue of the invalidated grandfather clause in Guinn. In striking down the law, Justice Felix Frankfurter declared for the Court that the Fifteenth Amendment nullified “sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination. It hits onerous procedural requirements which effectively handicap exercise of the franchise by the colored race although the abstract right to vote may remain unrestricted as to race.”<sup>6</sup>

Amdt15.S1.3 Exclusion from Primaries and Literacy Tests

Fifteenth Amendment, Section 1:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—

During the same period, the Court faced the exclusion of African Americans from participation in primary elections. While the Court did rule in 1927 that a State of Texas law violated the Equal Protection Clause by prohibiting Black voters from participating in a party primary, it did not hold at first that primary contests were elections to which federal constitutional guarantees applied.<sup>1</sup> Instead, the Court found that when an exclusion was perpetuated by political parties not acting in obedience to any statutory command, the discrimination did not constitute state action and was therefore not prohibited.<sup>2</sup> This holding was reversed nine years later in Smith v. Allwright when the Court declared that, where the selection of candidates for public office is entrusted by statute to political parties, a political party is acting as a state entity and must abide by the Fifteenth Amendment.<sup>3</sup> A severely divided Court was later faced with the exclusion of African Americans by a private organization that, independently of state law or the use of state election funds, monopolized access to Democratic nominations for local office. The exclusionary policy was struck down as unconstitutional but there was no opinion of the Court.<sup>4</sup>

In 1898, the Court held that literacy tests that apply to all voters equally are fair on their face, and in the absence of proof of discriminatory enforcement could not be said to deny equal protection.<sup>5</sup> The Court did, however, affirm striking down a literacy test in the State of Alabama’s constitutional amendment, the legislative history of which disclosed that its intent was to disenfranchise Black voters in violation of the Fifteenth Amendment.<sup>6</sup> After the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965,<sup>7</sup> when Congress amended the Act to suspend literacy tests throughout the Nation, the Court unanimously sustained the action as a valid measure to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment.<sup>8</sup>

Amdt15.S1.4 Racial Gerrymandering and Right to Vote Clause

Fifteenth Amendment, Section 1:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—

The Court has held that racially-based redistricting in order to dilute minority voting power is unconstitutional under the Fifteenth Amendment.<sup>1</sup> In Gomillion v. Lightfoot, the Court found a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment in the redrawing of a 1957 municipal boundary line in Tuskegee, Alabama, from a square into a twenty-eight-sided figure that excluded from municipal elections all but a few of its 400 Black voters but no White voters.<sup>2</sup>

In the 1980 case City of Mobile v. Bolden, in a considerably divided decision with respect to the requirement of discriminatory intent,<sup>3</sup> a plurality of the Court sought to restrict the Fifteenth Amendment to cases in which there is direct denial or abridgment of the right to register and vote, and to exclude dilution claims, such as the challenge to an at-large electoral system at issue.<sup>4</sup> Three Justices in separate opinions disagreed with the plurality's basis for putting aside the Fifteenth Amendment and suggested they would have applied the Amendment to the vote dilution claim.<sup>5</sup>

Subsequent decisions have largely adopted the view of Justice Charles Whitaker's concurrence<sup>6</sup> in Gomillion to resolve allegations of racial gerrymandering under the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.<sup>7</sup> Despite the Court's acknowledgments that racial gerrymandering may violate the purpose of the Fifteenth Amendment, the Fourteenth Amendment continues to be the predominant constitutional authority in such cases.<sup>8</sup>

Fifteenth Amendment, Section 2:

The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The Fifteenth Amendment prohibits denial of rights guaranteed “by the United States or by any State,” giving rise to the “state action” doctrine.<sup>1</sup> Nevertheless, the Supreme Court’s early interpretations of legislation passed to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment pursuant to Section 2 implied that Congress could protect Constitutional rights against deprivations from private, not just official or state-authorized, sources.<sup>2</sup> In the 1903 case James v. Bowman, however, the Court held that the Enforcement Act of 1870’s prohibition on private as well as official interference with the right to vote on racial grounds was unconstitutional.<sup>3</sup>

The Court began moving away from that interpretation by the 1940s.<sup>4</sup> In Smith v. Allwright, the exclusion of African Americans from political parties without the compulsion or sanction of state law was held to violate the Fifteenth Amendment because the political parties were acting in effect as agents of the state.<sup>5</sup> Then, in Terry v. Adams, the Court considered a powerful but private political organization that was not regulated by the state and selected its candidates for the Democratic primary election by its own processes.<sup>6</sup> The Court held that the exclusion of Black voters by the organization violated the Fifteenth Amendment, although a majority of the Justices did not agree on a rationale for the holding.<sup>7</sup>

In the 1960 case United States v. Raines, State of Georgia election officials challenged their own charges under the Civil Rights Act by alleging that the statute was unconstitutional as applied to private actors.<sup>8</sup> The Court did not rule on the argument, holding that the statute could constitutionally be applied to the defendants and it would not hear their contention that it would be void when applied to others.<sup>9</sup>

Federal Remedial Legislation

Amdt15.S2.2 Federal Remedial Legislation

Fifteenth Amendment, Section 2:

The Congress shall have the power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Federal remedial legislation related to the Fifteenth Amendment<sup>1</sup> culminated in the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 and its amendments.<sup>2</sup> Pursuant to the Voting Rights Act, Congress provided, among other things, that if the Attorney General determined that any state or political subdivision maintained any test or device, such as literacy tests, and that less than 50% of the voting age population in that jurisdiction was registered to vote or voted in the previous presidential election, such tests or devices were to be suspended for five years and no person could be denied the right to vote on that basis, and prescribed which states and jurisdictions with a history of discrimination were required to obtain “preclearance” before changing any voting law.<sup>3</sup>

Upholding the constitutionality of the Voting Rights Act a year later in South Carolina v. Katzenbach, the Court sketched the broad outlines of Congress’s power to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment.<sup>4</sup> The Court held that Congress could “enforce” the guarantee of the right to vote by any rational means at its disposal.<sup>5</sup> Congress was therefore justified in deciding that certain areas of the Nation were the primary locations of voting discrimination and in directing its remedial legislation to those areas.<sup>6</sup> The Katzenbach decision affirmed Congress’s power to enact measures designed to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment through broad affirmative prescriptions rather than through proscriptions of specific practices. Subsequent decisions of the Burger Court confirmed the reach of this power.<sup>7</sup> When Congress suspended literacy tests throughout the Nation in 1970, the Court unanimously sustained the action as a valid measure under the Fifteenth and Fourteenth Amendments.<sup>8</sup>

In the 1980 case City of Rome v. United States, the City had sought to exit the preclearance requirements of the Voting Rights Act by showing that it had not used any discriminatory practices within the prescribed period.<sup>9</sup> The lower court found that the City had engaged in practices without any discriminatory motive, but that its practices had a discriminatory impact.<sup>10</sup> The City thus argued that, because the Fifteenth Amendment reached only purposeful discrimination, the Act went beyond Congress’s power.<sup>11</sup> The Court held, however, <sup>1</sup> In Giles v. Harris, 189 U.S. 475 (1903), the Court refused to order the registration of 6,000 Black voters who alleged that they were being wrongly denied the franchise, suggesting that the petitioners apply to Congress or the President for relief. The passage of the 1957 Civil Rights Act authorized the Attorney General of the United States to seek injunctive relief to prevent interference with the voting rights of citizens. The 1960 Civil Rights Act and its amendments expanded on this authorization by permitting the Attorney General to seek a court finding of “pattern or practice” of discrimination in any particular jurisdiction.

that, even if discriminatory intent was a prerequisite to finding a violation of Section 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment,<sup>12</sup> Congress still had authority to proscribe electoral devices that have a discriminatory impact or effect.<sup>13</sup> The Court stated:

It is clear, then, that under § 2 of the Fifteenth Amendment Congress may prohibit practices that in and of themselves do not violate § 1 of the Amendment, so long as the prohibitions attacking racial discrimination in voting are “appropriate,” as that term is defined in McCulloch v. Maryland and Ex parte Virginia . . . . Congress could rationally have concluded that, because electoral changes by jurisdictions with a demonstrable history of intentional racial discrimination in voting create the risk of purposeful discrimination, it was proper to prohibit changes that have a discriminatory impact.<sup>14</sup>

However, just as the Court showed the Voting Rights Act’s reach in City of Rome, it almost simultaneously set limitations in City of Mobile v. Bolden that same year. As enacted in 1965, another section of the Voting Rights Act, Section 2, largely tracked the language of Section 1 of the Fifteenth Amendment.<sup>15</sup> In City of Mobile v. Bolden, a majority of the Court agreed that the Fifteenth Amendment and the Act were coextensive, but the Justices did not agree on the meaning to be ascribed to the statute.<sup>16</sup> A plurality believed that because the constitutional provision reached only purposeful discrimination, Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act was similarly limited. A major purpose of Congress’s 1982 amendments to the Act,<sup>17</sup> therefore, was to put aside this possible interpretation and to provide that any electoral practice “which results in a denial or abridgement” of the right to vote on account of race or color will violate the Act.<sup>18</sup>

The Court in Shelby County v. Holder,<sup>19</sup> however, emphasized the limits to the enforcement power of the Fifteenth Amendment in striking down Section 4 of the Act, which provided the formula that determined which states or electoral districts are required to submit electoral changes to the Department of Justice or a federal court for preclearance under Section 5 of the Act.<sup>20</sup> In Shelby County, the Court described the section 5 preclearance process as an “extraordinary departure from the traditional course of relations between the States and the Federal Government”<sup>21</sup> and violating the “fundamental principle of equal sovereignty” among

The 1982 amendments provide that the change may also not be approved if it would “perpetuate voting discrimination,” in effect applying the new Section 2 “results test” to preclearance procedures. S. states.<sup>22</sup> While the Court acknowledged that the disparate treatment of states under Section 4 could be justified by “unique circumstances,” such as those before Congress at the time of enactment of the Voting Rights Act,<sup>23</sup> the Court held that Congress could no longer “distinguish between States in such a fundamental way based on 40-year-old data, when today’s statistics tell an entirely different story” with respect to racial discrimination in covered jurisdictions.<sup>24</sup> The Court added, however, that Congress could “draft another formula [for preclearance] based on current conditions” that demonstrate “that exceptional conditions still exist justifying such an ‘exceptional departure from the traditional course of relations between the States and the Federal Government.’”<sup>25</sup>

In the 2021 case Brnovich v. Democratic National Committee, the Court continued to set limits on the Fifteenth Amendment’s enforcement power as applied through the Voting Rights Act by narrowing the circumstances through which a successful challenge can be brought under Section 2.<sup>26</sup> The Court, noting that the decision was its first interpreting a state’s “generally applicable time, place or manner voting rules” under Section 2, distinguished the case from previous challenges brought in the redistricting contexts.<sup>27</sup> In upholding two State of Arizona election provisions, restrictions on out-of-precinct voting and third-party ballot collection<sup>28</sup> that were challenged as disproportionately burdening minority voters, the Court applied a new version of the “totality of circumstances” test from Thornberg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986), with emphasis on the requirement that an alleged violation of Section 2 show there is not “equal openness” of participation in the election process.<sup>29</sup> The Court also provided new “guideposts” that take the form of five specific, but nonexhaustive, circumstances for courts to consider.<sup>30</sup>

SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT—INCOME TAX

Amdt16.1 Overview of Sixteenth Amendment, Income Tax

The Sixteenth Amendment, ratified in 1913, expanded on Congress’s taxing power. Article I grants Congress authority to collect taxes,<sup>1</sup> but requires direct taxes to be imposed proportional to the population of the states.<sup>2</sup> The Sixteenth Amendment clarified that Congress has the power to collect an income tax without apportionment among the states, and without regard to population.<sup>3</sup> As discussed in the following essays, the Amendment was adopted in response to a Supreme Court decision that invalidated a federal income tax after holding it was a direct tax that was not properly apportioned.<sup>4</sup> Accordingly, the Sixteenth Amendment essentially creates an income tax exception to the requirement in Article I that direct taxes must be apportioned based on states’ population.<sup>5</sup> This has raised the question—again, discussed in the following essays—of what counts as “income,” and whether any given federal tax extends beyond income.<sup>6</sup> The Court has stated the test generally as whether the law taxes payments that qualify as “profits or gains,”<sup>7</sup> although this applies “regardless of whether the particular transaction results in net profit.”<sup>8</sup> The Sixteenth Amendment applies to income derived “from whatever source,” and thus can be subject to a somewhat broad interpretation.<sup>9</sup> Nonetheless, the apportionment exception in the Sixteenth Amendment does not extend to taxes on property, as opposed to income derived from property.<sup>10</sup> to tax incomes uniformly throughout the United States.<sup>2</sup> A tax on incomes derived from property,<sup>3</sup> the Court declared, was a “direct tax,” which Congress, under the terms of Article I, Sections 2<sup>4</sup> and 9,<sup>5</sup> could impose only by the rule of apportionment according to population. Scarcely fifteen years earlier, in Springer v. United States,<sup>6</sup> the Justices had unanimously sustained a similar tax during the Civil War,<sup>7</sup> the only other occasion preceding the Sixteenth Amendment in which Congress had used this method of raising revenue.<sup>8</sup>

During the years between the Pollock decision in 1895 and the ratification of the Sixteenth Amendment in 1913, the Court appeared sensitive to Pollock's ramifications for the Government, which it partially addressed by redefining “direct tax” and emphasizing the Court's past favorable treatment of excise taxation. Thus, in a series of cases, notably Nicol v. Ames,<sup>9</sup> Knowlton v. Moore,<sup>10</sup> and Patton v. Brady,<sup>11</sup> the Court held the following taxes to have been levied upon “incidents of ownership” and hence to be excises: a tax that involved affixing revenue stamps to memoranda evidencing the sale of merchandise on commodity exchanges; an inheritance tax; and a war revenue tax upon tobacco, on which the hitherto imposed excise tax had already been paid and that the manufacturer held for resale. The Court also sustained a corporate income tax as an excise “measured by income” on the privilege of doing business in corporate form.<sup>12</sup>

The adoption of the Sixteenth Amendment, however, put an end to speculation whether the Court would eventually reverse Pollock. Indeed, in its initial appraisal<sup>13</sup> of the Amendment, the Court classified income taxes as being inherently “indirect,” stating:

[T]he command of the Amendment that all income taxes shall not be subject to apportionment by a consideration of the sources from which the taxed income may be derived, forbids the application to such taxes of the rule applied in the Pollock Case by which alone such taxes were removed from the great class of excises, duties and imports subject to the rule of uniformity and were placed under the other or direct class.<sup>14</sup>

The Court further observed: “[T]he Sixteenth Amendment conferred no new power of taxation but simply prohibited the previous complete and plenary power of income taxation

The Court voided the entire statute, however, on the ground that Congress never intended to permit the entire “burden of the tax to be borne by professions, trades, employments, or vocations” after exempting real estate and personal property. Pollock II, 158 U.S. at 635.

Amdt16.3 Income and Corporate Dividends

Sixteenth Amendment:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

Building upon definitions formulated in cases construing the Corporation Tax Act of 1909,<sup>1</sup> the Court initially described income as “gain derived from capital, from labor, or from both combined,” inclusive of the “profit gained through a sale or conversion of capital assets.”<sup>2</sup> Consistent with the belief that all income “in the ordinary sense of the word” became taxable under the Sixteenth Amendment, the earliest decisions of the Court on the taxability of corporate dividends occasioned little comment.

Emphasizing that a stockholder should be viewed as “a different entity from the corporation,” the Court in Lynch v. Hornby,<sup>3</sup> held that a cash dividend equal to 24% of the par value of the outstanding stock and made possible largely by converting assets earned prior to the adoption of the Amendment into money, was taxable income to the stockholder for the year in which he received it, although such an extraordinary payment might appear “to be a mere realization in possession of an inchoate and contingent interest . . . [of] the stockholder . . . in a surplus of corporate assets previously existing.”<sup>4</sup> In Peabody v. Eisner,<sup>5</sup> decided the same day as Lynch, the Court ruled that a dividend paid in the stock of another corporation, although representing earnings that had accrued before ratification of the Amendment, was also taxable to the shareholder as income. The Court likened the dividend to a distribution in specie.<sup>6</sup>

Two years later, the Court decided Eisner v. Macomber.<sup>7</sup> Departing from its earlier interpretations of the Sixteenth Amendment—that the Amendment corrected Pollock to restore income taxation to “the category of indirect taxation to which it inherently belonged”<sup>8</sup>—Justice Mahlon Pitney, writing for the Court, stated that the Sixteenth Amendment “did not extend the taxing power to new subjects, but merely removed the necessity which otherwise might exist for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on income.”<sup>9</sup> Specifically, Eisner held that a stock dividend was capital when a stockholder of the issuing corporation received it and the dividend did not become taxable “income” until sold or converted, and then only to the extent that the stockholder realized a gain upon the proportion of the original investment that the stock represented. A stock dividend, Justice Mahlon Pitney maintained:

Consequently, the Court held the distribution was not taxable income to the shareholder in the year in which the shareholder actually received it. Similarly, Southern Pacific Co. v. Lowe, 247 U.S. 330 (1918), concerned a railway company whose entire capital stock was owned by and whose physical assets were leased to and used by another railway company. The Court held the dividends that the first railway company paid out of surplus accumulated before the Sixteenth Amendment’s effective date to be a nontaxable bookkeeping transaction between virtually identical corporations.

Far from being a realization of profits of the stockholder . . . tends rather to postpone such realization, in that the fund represented by the new stock has been transferred from surplus to capital, and no longer is available for actual distribution. . . . We are clear that not only does a stock dividend really take nothing from the property of the corporation and add nothing to that of the shareholder, but that the antecedent accumulation of profits evidenced thereby, while indicating that the shareholder is richer because of an increase of his capital, at the same time shows [that] he has not realized or received any income in the transaction.<sup>10</sup>

Conceding that a stock dividend represented a gain, Justice Mahlon Pitney concluded that the only gain taxable as “income” under the Amendment was “a gain, a profit, something of exchangeable value proceeding from the property, severed from the capital however invested or employed, and coming in, being ‘derived,’ that is, received or drawn by the recipient (the taxpayer) for his separate use, benefit and disposal;—that is income derived from property. Nothing else answers the description,” including “a gain accruing to capital, not a growth or increment of value in the investment.”<sup>11</sup>

Although the Court has not overturned the principle it asserted in Eisner v. Macomber,<sup>12</sup> it has narrowed its application. In United States v. Phellis, the Court treated as taxable income new stock issued in connection with a corporate reorganization designed to move the place of incorporation.<sup>13</sup> The Court rejected a test that compared the market value of the shares in the older corporation with the aggregate market value of those shares plus the dividend shares immediately after the reorganization, which showed that the stockholders experienced no increase in aggregate wealth.<sup>14</sup> Instead, the Court viewed the shareholders as having essentially exchanged stock in the old corporation for stock in the new corporation. The Phellis Court stated:

It thus appears that in substance and fact, as well as in appearance, the dividend received by claimant was a gain, a profit, derived from his capital interest in the old company, not in liquidation of the capital but in distribution of accumulated profits of the company; something of exchangeable value produced by and proceeding from his

United States*, 268 U.S. 536 (1925), the Court held that the increased market value of stock issued by a new corporation in exchange for the stock of an older corporation—the assets of which the new corporation would absorb—was taxable income to the holder, even though the income represented the older corporation’s profits and the capital remained invested in the same general enterprise. The Court likened Weiss v. Stearn, 265 U.S. 242 (1924), to Eisner v. Macomber, and distinguished it from the aforementioned cases on the ground of preservation of corporate identity. The Court observed that: “[Although the] new corporation had . . . been organized to take over the assets and business of the old . . . [,] the corporate identity was deemed to have been substantially maintained because the new corporation was organized under the laws of the same State with presumably the same powers as the old. There was also no change in the character of the securities issued. By reason of these facts, the proportional interest of the stockholder after the distribution of the new securities was deemed to be exactly the same . . . .” Marr, 268 U.S. at 541. Similarly, consistent with Eisner v. Macomber, the Court ruled that a dividend in common stock paid to holders of preferred stock, and a dividend in preferred stock paid to holders of common stock, constitute taxable income under the Sixteenth Amendment because they gave the stockholders an interest different from that represented by their prior holdings.

investment therein, severed from it and drawn by him for his separate use. Hence it constituted individual income within the meaning of the income tax law . . . .<sup>15</sup>

By contrast, in Miles v. Safe Deposit Company, the Court held that no taxable income resulted when a stockholder received rights to subscribe for shares in a new issue of capital stock, the intrinsic value of which was assumed to exceed the issuing price.<sup>16</sup> The Court declared the right to subscribe to be analogous to a stock dividend, stating “the District Court rightly held defendant in error liable to income tax as to so much of the proceeds of sale of the subscription rights as represented a realized profit over and above the cost to it of what was sold.”<sup>17</sup>

Sixteenth Amendment:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

In Helvering v. National Grocery Company, the Court rejected the contention that a tax on undistributed corporate profits is essentially a penalty or a direct tax on capital subject to apportionment.<sup>1</sup> Because the exaction was permissible as a tax, its penal objective, which was “to force corporations to distribute earnings in order to create a basis for taxation against the stockholders,” did not impair its validity.<sup>2</sup> The Court rejected the contention that the tax was a direct tax on a state of mind because liability was assessed upon a mere purpose to evade imposition of surtaxes against stockholders. The Court held that, while “the existence of the defined purpose was a condition precedent to the imposition of the tax liability,” that “[did] not prevent it from being a true income tax within the meaning of the Sixteenth Amendment.”<sup>3</sup> Subsequently, in Helvering v. Northwest Steel Mills,<sup>4</sup> the Court addressed the constitutionality of the undistributed profits tax, observing:

It is true that the surtax is imposed upon annual income only if it is not distributed, but this does not serve to make it anything other than a true tax on income within the meaning of the Sixteenth Amendment. Nor is it true . . . that because there might be an impairment of the capital stock, the tax on the current annual profit would be the equivalent of a tax upon capital. Mitchell*, 303 U.S. 391 (1938), the defendant contended that the collection of 50% of any deficiency in addition to the deficiency alleged to have resulted from a fraudulent intent to evade the income tax amounted to the imposition of a criminal penalty. The Court, however, described the additional sum as a civil and not a criminal sanction, and one which could be constitutionally employed to safeguard the Government against loss of revenue. In contrast, the exaction upheld in Helvering v. National Grocery Co., though conceded to possess the attributes of a civil sanction, was held to be sustainable as a tax.

or not, the tax . . . was imposed on profits earned during a definite period—a tax year—and therefore on profits constituting income within the meaning of the Sixteenth Amendment.<sup>5</sup>

Similarly, the Court has held Congress's power to tax the income of an unincorporated joint stock association to be unaffected by the fact that, under state law, the association is not a legal entity and cannot hold title to property, or by the fact that the shareholders are liable for its debts as partners.<sup>6</sup>

Whether subsidies paid to corporations in money or in the form of grants of land or other physical property constitute taxable income has also concerned the Court. In Edwards v. Cuba Railroad,<sup>7</sup> the Court ruled that subsidies of lands, equipment, and money paid by Cuba to construct a railroad were not taxable income but should be viewed as having been received by the railroad as a reimbursement for capital expenditures in completing such project.

On the other hand, sums the Federal Government paid to fulfill its guarantee of minimum operating revenue to railroads during the six months following relinquishment of their control by that government were found to be taxable income. Such payments were distinguished from those excluded from computation of income in the preceding case in that the former were neither bonuses, nor gifts, nor subsidies, "that is, contributions to capital."<sup>8</sup> Other corporate receipts deemed to be taxable as income include: (1) "insiders profits" realized by a director and stockholder of a corporation from transaction in its stock, which, as required by the Securities and Exchange Act,<sup>9</sup> are paid over to the corporation;<sup>10</sup> (2) money received as exemplary damages for fraud or as the punitive two-thirds portion of a treble damage antitrust recovery;<sup>11</sup> and (3) compensation awarded for the fair rental value of trucking facilities operated by the taxpayer under control and possession of the government during World War II, for in the last instance the government never acquired title to the property and had not damaged it beyond ordinary wear.<sup>12</sup>

Amdt16.5 Gains

Sixteenth Amendment:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

The Supreme Court has stated that although "economic gain is not always taxable as income, it is settled that the realization of gain need not be in cash derived from the sale of an asset."<sup>1</sup> Thus, when through forfeiture of a lease, a landlord became possessed of a new building erected on his land by the outgoing tenant, the resulting gain to the former was taxable to him in that same year. The Court noted:

The fact that the gain is a portion of the value of the property received by the taxpayer in the transaction does not negative its realization. . . . It is not necessary to recognition of taxable gain that he should be able to sever the improvement begetting the gain from his original capital. If that were necessary, no income could arise from the exchange of property; whereas such gain has always been recognized as realized taxable gain.<sup>2</sup>

Hence, the taxpayer was incorrect in contending “that the Amendment does not permit the taxation of such [a] gain without apportionment amongst the states.”<sup>3</sup> Consistent with this holding, the Court has also ruled that, when an apartment house was acquired by bequest subject to an unassumed mortgage, and several years later was sold for a price slightly in excess of the mortgage, the basis for determining the gain from that sale was the difference between the selling price, undiminished by the amount of the mortgage, and the value of the property at the time of the acquisition, less deductions for depreciation during the years the building was held by the taxpayer. The latter’s contention that the Revenue Act, as thus applied, taxed something that was not revenue, was declared to be unfounded.<sup>4</sup>

The Court also rejected the argument that a gift of stock became a capital asset of the donee and that, consequently, no part of the stock’s value could be treated as taxable income of the donee when sold. The Court held that it was within the power of Congress to require a donee of stock, who sells it at a profit, to pay income tax on the difference between the selling price and the value when the donor acquired it.<sup>5</sup> In Helvering v. Horst, the Court explained:

[N]ot all economic gain of the taxpayer is taxable income. From the beginning the revenue laws have been interpreted as defining ‘realization’ of income as the taxable event, rather than the acquisition of the right to receive it. And ‘realization’ is not deemed to occur until the income is paid. But the decisions and regulations have consistently recognized that receipt in cash or property is not the only characteristic of realization of income to a taxpayer on the cash receipts basis. Where the taxpayer does not receive payment of income in money or property realization may occur when the last step is taken by which he obtains the fruition of the economic gain which has already accrued to him.<sup>6</sup>

Consequently, an owner of bonds, reporting on the cash receipts basis, who clipped interest coupons therefrom before their due date and gave them to his son, was held to have realized taxable income in the amount of said coupons, notwithstanding that his son had collected them upon maturity later in the year.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>5</sup> In Taft v. Bowers, the Court observed that the donor could not, “by mere gift, enable another to hold this stock free from . . . [the] right . . . [of] the sovereign to take part of any increase in its value when separated through sale or conversion and reduced to possession.” 278 U.S. 470, 482, 484 (1929). However, when a husband, as part of a divorce settlement, transfers his own corporate stock to his wife, he is deemed to have exchanged the stock for the release of his wife’s inchoate, marital rights, the value of which are presumed to be equal to the current, market value of the stock, and, accordingly, he incurs a taxable gain measured by the difference between the initial purchase price of the stock and said market value upon transfer. *United States v. <sup>7</sup> Helvering 311 U.S. at 115. The Court was also called upon to resolve questions as to whether gains, realized after 1913, on transactions consummated prior to ratification of the Sixteenth Amendment, were taxable and, if so, how such tax was to be determined. The Court’s answer generally was that if the gain to the person whose income is under consideration became such subsequent to the date at which the amendment went into effect, namely, March 1, 1913, and was a real—not merely an apparent—gain, said gain is taxable. Thus, one who purchased stock in 1912 for $500

Amdt16.6 Income from Illicit Transactions

Sixteenth Amendment:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

In United States v. Sullivan,<sup>1</sup> the Court held that gains derived from illicit traffic were taxable income under the Act of 1921.<sup>2</sup> Justice Oliver Holmes wrote, for the unanimous Court: “We see no reason . . . why the fact that a business is unlawful should exempt it from paying the taxes that if lawful it would have to pay.”<sup>3</sup> Consistent with that decision, although not without dissent, the Court ruled that Congress has the power to tax as income moneys received by an extortioner,<sup>4</sup> and, more recently, that embezzled money is taxable income of an embezzler in the year of embezzlement. In James v. United States, the Court reasoned

When a taxpayer acquires earnings, lawfully or unlawfully, without the consensual recognition, express or implied, of an obligation to repay and without restriction as to their disposition, he has received income which he is required to return, even though it may still be claimed that he is not entitled to retain the money, and even though he may still be adjudged liable to restore its equivalent.<sup>5</sup> could not limit his taxable gain to the difference between the value of the stock on March 1, 1913—$695—and the price obtained on the sale thereof, in 1916—$13,931. Instead, the seller was obliged to pay tax on the entire gain, that is, the difference between the original purchase price of $500 and the $13,931 in proceeds of the sale. Goodrich v. Edwards, 255 U.S. 527 (1921). Conversely, one who acquired stock in 1912 for $291,600 and who sold the same in 1916 for only $269,346, incurred a loss and could not be taxed at all, notwithstanding the fact that on March 1, 1913, his stock had depreciated to $148,635. Walsh v. Brewster, 255 U.S. 536 (1921). On the other hand, although the difference between the amount of life insurance premiums paid as of 1908, and the amount distributed in 1919, when the insured received the amount of his policy plus cash dividends apportioned thereto since 1908, constituted a gain, that portion of the latter that accrued between 1908 and 1913 was deemed to be an accretion of capital and hence not taxable. Lucas v. Alexander, 279 U.S. 473 (1929). However, a litigant who, in 1915, reduced to judgment a suit pending on February 26, 1913, for an accounting under a patent infringement, was unable to have treated as capital, and excluded from the taxable income produced by such settlement, that portion of his claim that had accrued prior to March 1, 1913. Income within the meaning of the Amendment was interpreted to be the fruit that is born of capital, not the potency of fruition. All that the taxpayer possessed in 1913 was a contingent chose in action that was inchoate, uncertain, and contested. United States v. Safety Car Heating Co., 297 U.S. 88 (1936).

Similarly, purchasers of coal lands subject to mining leases executed before adoption of the Amendment could not successfully contend that royalties received from 1920 to 1926 were payments for capital assets sold before March 1, 1913, and hence not taxable. Such an exemption, these purchasers argued, would have been in harmony with applicable local law, under which title to coal passes immediately to the lessee on execution of such leases. To the Court, however, such leases were not to be viewed “as a ‘sale’ of the mineral content of the soil,” as minerals “may or may not be present in the leased premises, and may or may not be found [therein]. . . . If found, their abstraction . . . is a time-consuming operation and the payments made by the lessee to the lessor do not normally become payable as the result of a single transaction. . . .” The result for tax purposes would have been the same even had the lease provided that title to the minerals would pass only “on severance by the lessee.” Burnet v. Harmel, 287 U.S. 103, 107, 106, 111 (1932).

Amdt16.7 Deductions and Exemptions

Sixteenth Amendment:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

The Sixteenth Amendment authorization to tax income “from whatever source derived” does not preclude Congress from granting exemptions.<sup>1</sup> Thus, the fact that, “[u]nder the Revenue Acts of 1913, 1916, 1917 and 1918, stock fire insurance companies were taxed upon their income, including gains realized from the sale or other disposition of property accruing subsequent to March 1, 1913,”<sup>2</sup> but were not so taxed by the Revenue Acts of 1921, 1924, and 1926, did not prevent Congress, under the terms of the Revenue Act of 1928, from taxing all the gain attributable to increase in value after March 1, 1913, that such a company realized from a sale of property in 1928.<sup>3</sup> The constitutional power of Congress to tax a gain being well-established, the Court found Congress competent to choose “the moment of its realization and the amount realized”; and “[i]ts failure to impose a tax upon the increase in value in the earlier years . . . cannot preclude it from taxing the gain in the year when realized.”<sup>4</sup> As the Court has observed, Congress is equally well-equipped with the “power to condition, limit, or deny deductions from gross incomes in order to arrive at the net that it chooses to tax.”<sup>5</sup> Accordingly, even though the rental value of a building used by its owner does not constitute income within the meaning of the Amendment,<sup>6</sup> Congress was competent to provide that an insurance company shall not be entitled to deductions for depreciation, maintenance, and property taxes on real estate owned and occupied by it unless it includes in its computation of gross income the rental value of the space thus used.<sup>7</sup>

Also, a taxpayer who erected a $3,000,000 office building on land, the unimproved value of which was $660,000, and who subsequently purchased the lease on the latter for $2,100,000, is entitled to compute depreciation over the remaining useful life of the building on that portion of $1,440,000, representing the difference between the price and the unimproved value, as may be allocated to the building; but he cannot deduct the $1,440,000 as a business expense

<sup>6</sup> A tax on the rental value of property so occupied is a direct tax on the land and must be apportioned. Helvering v. Independent L. Ins. Co., 292 U.S. 371, 378–79 (1934).

<sup>7</sup> Helvering, 292 U.S. at 381. Expenditures incurred in the prosecution of work under a contract for the purpose of earning profits are not capital investments, the cost of which, if converted, must first be restored from the proceeds before there is a capital gain taxable as income. Accordingly, a dredging contractor, recovering a judgment for breach of warranty of the character of the material to be dredged, must include the amount thereof in the gross income of the year in which it was received, rather than of the years during which the contract was performed, even though it merely represents a return of expenditures made in performing the contract and resulting in a loss. The gain or profit subject to tax under the Sixteenth Amendment is the excess of receipts over allowable deductions during the accounting period, without regard to whether or not such excess represents a profit ascertained on the basis of particular transactions of the taxpayer when they are brought to a conclusion. Burnet v. Sanford & Brooks Co., 282 U.S. 359 (1931).

The grant or denial of deductions is not based on the taxpayers' engagement in constitutionally protected activities; accordingly, no deduction is granted for sums expended in combating legislation, enactment of which would destroy taxpayer's business. Cammarano v. United States, 358 U.S. 498 (1959).

Likewise, when tank truck owners, either intentionally for business reasons or unintentionally, violate state maximum weight laws, and incur fines, the latter are not deductible, for fines are penalties rather than tolls for the use of highways, and Congress is not to be viewed as having intended to encourage enterprises to violate state policy. Tank Truck Rentals v. Commissioner, 356 U.S. 30 (1958); Hoover Express Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 38 (1958).

incurred in eliminating the cost of allegedly excessive rentals under the lease, nor can he treat that sum as a prepayment of rent to be amortized over the twenty-one-year period that the lease was to run.<sup>8</sup>

Amdt16.8 Diminution of Loss

Sixteenth Amendment:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

Mere diminution of loss is neither gain, profit, nor income. Accordingly, in Bowers v. Kerbaugh-Empire, the Court held that one who in 1913 borrowed a sum of money to be repaid in German marks and who subsequently lost the money in a business transaction cannot be taxed on the curtailment of debt effected by using depreciated marks in 1921 to settle a liability of $798,144 for $113,688, the “saving” having been exceeded by a loss on the entire operation.<sup>1</sup> The Court stated:

The contention that the item in question is cash gain disregards the fact that the borrowed money was lost, and that the excess of such loss over income was more than the amount borrowed. When the loans were made and notes given, the assets and liabilities of defendant in error were increased alike. The loss of the money borrowed wiped out the increase of assets, but the liability remained. The assets were further diminished by payment of the debt. The loss was less than it would have been if marks had not declined in value; but the mere diminution of loss is not gain, profit or income.<sup>2</sup>

SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT—POPULAR ELECTION OF SENATORS

Amdt17.1 Overview of Seventeenth Amendment, Popular Election of Senators

The ratification of the Seventeenth Amendment was the outcome of increasing popular dissatisfaction with the original method of state legislatures selecting Senators set forth at Article I, Section 3, Clause 1.<sup>1</sup> As more people were able to exercise the franchise, the belief became widespread that Senators ought to be popularly elected in the same manner as Representatives.<sup>2</sup> Acceptance of this idea was fostered by the mounting accumulation of evidence of the practical disadvantages and malpractices attendant upon legislative selection, such as deadlocks within legislatures resulting in vacancies remaining unfilled for substantial intervals, the influencing of legislative selection by corrupt political organizations and special interest groups through purchase of legislative seats, and the neglect of other duties by legislators as a consequence of protracted electoral contests.

Amdt17.2 Historical Background on Popular Election of Senators

Seventeenth Amendment:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

Prior to ratification of the Seventeenth Amendment, many states had adopted arrangements calculated to afford voters more effective control over the selection of Senators. Some states amended their laws to enable voters participating in primary elections to designate their preference for one of several party candidates for a senatorial seat and state legislatures generally elected the winning candidate of the majority. In two states, candidates for legislative seats were required to promise to support, without regard to party ties, the senatorial candidate polling the most votes. As a result of such developments, the year before the Seventeenth Amendment was ratified, at least twenty-nine states were nominating Senators on a popular basis, and, as a consequence, the constitutional discretion of the state legislatures had been reduced to little more than that retained by presidential electors.<sup>1</sup>

Amdt17.3 Doctrine on Popular Election of Senators

Seventeenth Amendment:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years; and each Senator shall have one vote. The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies: Provided, That the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments until the people fill the vacancies by election as the legislature may direct.

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

Shortly after ratification of the Seventeenth Amendment, some courts took the position that if a person possessed the qualifications required to vote for a Senator, the person's right to vote for the Senator was not derived merely from the constitution and laws of the state that chose the Senator, but had its foundation in the Constitution of the United States.<sup>1</sup> Consistent with this view, federal courts declared that, when local party authorities, acting pursuant to regulations prescribed by a party's state executive committee, refused to permit a Black citizen, on account of his race, to vote in a primary to select candidates for the office of U.S. Senator, they had deprived him of a right secured to him by the Constitution and laws, in violation of the Seventeenth Amendment.<sup>2</sup> By contrast, the Supreme Court held that an Illinois statute that required a petition signed by at least 25,000 voters from at least fifty counties to form and nominate candidates for a new political party did not violate the Seventeenth Amendment, notwithstanding that 52% of the state's voters were residents of one county, 87% were residents of forty counties, and only 13% resided in the fifty-three least populous counties.<sup>3</sup>

I, § 2.

EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT—PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR

Amdt18.1 Overview of Eighteenth Amendment, Prohibition of Alcohol

Eighteenth Amendment

Section 1:

After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Section 2:

The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Section 3:

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

The Eighteenth Amendment was proposed by Congress on December 18, 1917, when it passed the Senate<sup>1</sup>, having previously passed the House on December 17.<sup>2</sup> It appears officially in 40 Stat. 1059. Ratification was completed on January 16, 1919, when the thirty-sixth state approved the amendment, there being then forty-eight states in the Union. On January 29, 1919, Acting Secretary of State Polk certified that this amendment had been adopted by the requisite number of states.<sup>3</sup> By its terms this amendment did not become effective until one year after ratification.

The Eighteenth Amendment was repealed by the Twenty-First Amendment, and titles I and II of the National Prohibition Act<sup>4</sup> were subsequently specifically repealed by the Act of August 27, 1935.<sup>5</sup> Federal prohibition laws effective in various Districts and Territories were repealed as follows: District of Columbia—April 5, 1933, and January 24, 1934;<sup>6</sup> Puerto Rico and Virgin Islands—March 2, 1934;<sup>7</sup> Hawaii—March 26, 1934;<sup>8</sup> and Panama Canal Zone—June 19, 1934.<sup>9</sup>

Noting that ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment was completed on December 5, 1933, the Supreme Court held that the National Prohibition Act, insofar as it rested upon a grant of authority to Congress by the Eighteenth Amendment, thereupon become inoperative, with the result that prosecutions for violations of the National Prohibition Act, including proceedings on appeal, pending on, or begun after the date of repeal, had to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Only final judgments of conviction rendered while the National Prohibition Act was in force remained unaffected.<sup>10</sup> Likewise a heavy “special excise tax,” insofar as it could be construed as part of the machinery for enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment, was deemed to have become inapplicable automatically upon the Amendment’s repeal.<sup>11</sup> However, liability on a bond conditioned upon the return on the day of trial of a vessel seized for illegal transportation of liquor was held not to have been extinguished by repeal when the facts disclosed that the trial took place in 1931 and had resulted in conviction of the crew. The liability became complete upon occurrence of the breach of the express contractual condition, and a civil action for recovery was viewed as unaffected by the loss of penal sanctions.<sup>12</sup>

United States Marshal*, 143 F.2d 830 (2d Cir. 1944). Because the Twenty-First Amendment contains “no saving clause as to prosecutions for offenses therefore committed,” these holdings were rendered unavoidable by virtue of the well-established principle that after “the expiration or repeal of a law, no penalty can be enforced, nor punishment inflicted, for violations of the law committed while it was in force. . . .” The General Pinkney, 9 U.S. (5 Cr.) 281, 283 (1809), quoted in United States v. Chambers, 291 U.S. at 223.

<sup>11</sup> United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287 (1935). The Court also took the position that, even if the statute embodying this “tax” had not been “adopted to penalize violations of the Amendment,” but merely to obtain a penalty for violations of state liquor laws, “it ceased to be enforceable at the date of repeal,” for with the lapse of the unusual enforcement powers contained in the Eighteenth Amendment, Congress could not, without infringing upon powers reserved to the states by the Tenth Amendment, “impose cumulative penalties above and beyond those specified by State law for infractions of . . . [a] State’s criminal code by its own citizens.” Justice Benjamin Cardozo, joined by Justices Louis Brandeis and Harlan Stone, dissented on the ground that, on its face, the statute levying this “tax” was “an appropriate instrument of . . . fiscal policy. . . . Classification by Congress according to the nature of the calling affected by a tax . . . does not cease to be permissible because the line of division between callings to be favored and those to be reproved corresponds with a division between innocence and criminality under the statutes of a state.” Id. at 294, 296, 297–98. In earlier cases, the Court nevertheless recognized that Congress also may tax what it forbids and that the basic tax on distilled spirits remained valid and enforceable during as well as after the life of the Amendment. See United States v. Yuginovich, 256 U.S. 450, 462 (1921); United States v. Stafoff, 260 U.S. 477 (1923); United States v. Rizzo, 297 U.S. 530 (1936).

NINETEENTH AMENDMENT—WOMEN’S SUFFRAGE

Amdt19.1 Overview of Nineteenth Amendment, Women’s Voting Rights

Nineteenth Amendment:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The Nineteenth Amendment was adopted after a long campaign by its advocates, who had largely despaired of attaining their goal through modification of individual state laws. Agitation in behalf of women’s suffrage was recorded as early as the Jackson Administration, but the initial results were meager. Beginning in 1838, Kentucky authorized women to vote in school elections and its action was later copied by a number of other states. Kansas in 1887 granted women unlimited rights to vote in municipal elections. Not until 1869, however, when the Wyoming Territory accorded women suffrage rights on an equal basis with men and continued the practice following admission to statehood, did these advocates register a notable victory. Progress continued to be discouraging, only ten additional states having joined Wyoming by 1914, and judicial efforts having failed.<sup>1</sup> A vigorous campaign brought congressional passage of a proposed Amendment in 1919 and the necessary state ratifications in 1920.<sup>2</sup>

In one case, the Supreme Court dealt with the Nineteenth Amendment’s effect, holding that a Georgia poll tax statute that exempted from payment women who did not register to vote did not discriminate in any manner against the right of men to vote, although the Court noted that the Nineteenth Amendment “applies to men and women alike and by its own force supersedes inconsistent measures, whether federal or State.”<sup>3</sup>

TWENTIETH AMENDMENT—PRESIDENTIAL TERM AND SUCCESSION

SECTION 1—TERMS

Amdt20.S1.1 Presidential and Congressional Terms

Twentieth Amendment, Section 1:

The terms of the President and the Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

Article II, Section 1, Clause 1 of the Constitution<sup>1</sup> fixed the term of the President at four years. By a resolution of the Confederation, Congress commenced under the Constitution on March 4, 1789. Consequently, the February 6, 1933 ratification of Section 1 of the Twentieth Amendment in effect shortened the terms of the President and Vice President elected in 1932 by the interval between January 20 and March 4, 1937.

Similarly, ratification of the Twentieth Amendment shortened, by the intervals between January 3 and March 4, the terms of Senators elected for terms ending March 4, 1935, 1937, and 1939; and thus temporarily modified the Seventeenth Amendment, fixing the terms of Senators at six years. It also shortened the terms of Representatives elected to the 73rd Congress, by the interval between January 3 and March 4, 1935, and temporarily modified Article I, Section 2, Clause 1, fixing the terms of Representatives at two years.

SECTION 2—MEETINGS OF CONGRESS

Amdt20.S2.1 Date When Congress Shall Meet

Twentieth Amendment, Section 2:

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

Section 2 of the Twentieth Amendment superseded Clause 2 of Section 4 of Article I.<sup>1</sup> Setting an exact hour for Congress to meet recognized Congress's long practice, which it enacted into permanent law for the first time in 1867<sup>2</sup> but repealed in 1871.<sup>3</sup> When January 3 fell on Sunday (in 1937), Congress appointed a different day by law to assemble.<sup>4</sup>

SECTION 3—SUCCESSION

Amdt20.S3.1 Presidential Succession

Twentieth Amendment, Section 3:

If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

Sec. 3—Succession

Amdt20.S3.1

Presidential Succession

Pursuant to the authority conferred upon it by Section 3 of the Twentieth Amendment, Congress passed the Presidential Succession Act of 1948<sup>1</sup> to address the situation that would arise if both the President-elect and Vice President-elect failed to qualify on or before the time fixed for the beginning of the new Presidential term.

SECTION 4—CONGRESS AND PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION

Amdt20.S4.1 Congress's Power to Provide Further for Presidential Succession

Twentieth Amendment, Section 4:

The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

In 1947, Congress adopted the Presidential Succession Act,<sup>1</sup> which provided for the Speaker of the House to “act as President”<sup>2</sup> followed by the President Pro Tempore of the Senate, and then by the department heads in the order in which each department had been established.

SECTION 5—EFFECTIVE DATE

Amdt20.S5.1 Effective Date of Sections 1 and 2 of Twentieth Amendment

Twentieth Amendment, Section 5:

Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

Because the Twentieth Amendment was ratified on January 23, 1933, Sections 1 and 2 of the Twentieth Amendment<sup>1</sup> became effective on October 15, 1933.

Twentieth Amendment, Section 6:

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission.

The Twentieth Amendment was proposed by Congress on March 2, 1932, when it passed the Senate<sup>1</sup>, having previously passed the House on March 1.<sup>2</sup> It appears officially in 47 Stat. 745. Ratification was completed on January 23, 1933, when the thirty-sixth state approved the amendment, there being then forty-eight states in the Union. On February 6, 1933, Secretary of State Stimson certified that it had become a part of the Constitution.<sup>3</sup>

TWENTY-FIRST AMENDMENT—REPEAL OF PROHIBITION

SECTION 1—REPEAL OF EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Amdt21.S1.1 Repeal of Prohibition

Twenty-First Amendment, Section 1:

The eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is hereby repealed.

Ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment on January 23, 1933 repealed the Eighteenth Amendment, which had prohibited “the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes.”<sup>1</sup>

SECTION 2—IMPORTATION, TRANSPORTATION, AND SALE OF LIQUOR

Amdt21.S2.1 Discrimination Against Interstate Commerce

Twenty-First Amendment, Section 2:

The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

In a series of decisions rendered shortly after ratification of the Twenty-First Amendment, the Court established the proposition that states are competent to adopt legislation discriminating against imported intoxicating liquors in favor of those of domestic origin and that such discrimination offends neither the Commerce Clause of Article I nor the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. Modern cases, however, have recognized that “state regulation of alcohol is limited by the nondiscrimination principle of the Commerce Clause,”<sup>1</sup> also known as the Dormant Commerce Clause.<sup>2</sup>

Initially, the Court upheld a California statute that exacted a $500 annual license fee for the privilege of importing beer from other states and a $750 fee for the privilege of manufacturing beer,<sup>3</sup> and a Minnesota statute that prohibited a licensed manufacturer or wholesaler from importing any brand of intoxicating liquor containing more than 25% alcohol by volume and ready for sale without further processing, unless such brand was registered in the United States Patent Office.<sup>4</sup> Also validated were retaliation laws prohibiting sale of beer from states that discriminated against sale of beer from the enacting state.<sup>5</sup>

Conceding, in State Board of Equalization v. Young’s Market Co.,<sup>6</sup> that, “[p]rior to the Twenty-first Amendment it would obviously have been unconstitutional to have imposed any fee for [the privilege of importation] . . . even if the State had exacted an equal fee for the privilege of transporting domestic beer from its place of manufacture to the [seller's] place of business," the Court proclaimed that this Amendment "abrogated the right to import free, so far as concerns intoxicating liquors." Because the Amendment was viewed as conferring on states an unconditioned authority to prohibit totally the importation of intoxicating beverages, it followed that any discriminatory restriction falling short of total exclusion was equally valid, notwithstanding the absence of any connection between such restriction and public health, safety, or morals. As to the contention that the unequal treatment of imported beer would contravene the Equal Protection Clause, the Court succinctly observed that "[a] classification recognized by the Twenty-first Amendment cannot be deemed forbidden by the Fourteenth."<sup>7</sup>

In Seagram & Sons v. Hostetter<sup>8</sup> the Court upheld a state statute regulating the price of intoxicating liquors, asserting that the Twenty-First Amendment bestowed upon the states broad regulatory power over the liquor sales within their territories.<sup>9</sup> The Court also noted that states are not totally bound by traditional Commerce Clause limitations when they restrict the importation of intoxicants destined for use, distribution, or consumption within their borders.<sup>10</sup> In such a situation the Twenty-First Amendment demands wide latitude for regulation by the state.<sup>11</sup> The Court added that there was nothing in the Twenty-First Amendment or any other part of the Constitution that required state laws regulating the liquor business to be motivated exclusively by a desire to promote temperance.<sup>12</sup>

More recent cases undercut the expansive interpretation of state powers in Young's Market and the other early cases. The first step was to harmonize Twenty-First Amendment and Commerce Clause principles where possible by asking "whether the interests implicated by a state regulation are so closely related to the powers reserved by the Twenty-first Amendment that the regulation may prevail, notwithstanding that its requirements directly conflict with express federal policies."<sup>13</sup> Because "[t]he central purpose of the [Amendment] was not to empower States to favor local liquor industries by erecting barriers to competition," the "central tenet" of the Commerce Clause will control to invalidate "mere economic protectionism," at least where the state cannot justify its tax or regulation as "designed to promote temperance or to carry out any other purpose of the . . . Amendment."<sup>14</sup> But the Court eventually came to view the Twenty-First Amendment as not creating an exception to the commerce power. "[S]tate regulation of alcohol is limited by the nondiscrimination principle of the Commerce Clause,” the Court stated in 2005.<sup>15</sup> Discrimination in favor of local products can be upheld only if the state “advances a legitimate local purpose that cannot be adequately served by reasonable nondiscriminatory alternatives.”<sup>16</sup> This interpretation stemmed from the Court’s conclusion that the Twenty-First Amendment restored to states the powers that they had possessed prior to Prohibition “to maintain an effective and uniform system for controlling liquor by regulating its transportation, importation, and use” in a manner that did not discriminate against out-of-state goods.<sup>17</sup>

Consequently, in Granholm v. Heald, the Supreme Court struck down regulatory schemes employed by Michigan and New York that discriminated against out-of-state wineries.<sup>18</sup> Both states employed a “three-tier system,” in which producers, wholesalers, and retailers had to be separately licensed by the state.<sup>19</sup> The Court first affirmed its prior cases holding that as a general matter, “States can mandate a three-tier distribution scheme in the exercise of their authority under the Twenty-first Amendment.”<sup>20</sup> But within their three-tier systems, Michigan and New York gave certain advantages to in-state wineries by creating special licensing systems allowing them to directly ship wine to in-state consumers.<sup>21</sup> While recognizing that both states did have significant authority to regulate the importation and sale of liquor, the Court said that the challenged systems “involve[d] straightforward attempts to discriminate in favor of local producers . . . contrary to the Commerce Clause,” and that these schemes could not be “saved by the Twenty-first Amendment.”<sup>22</sup>

The states argued in Granholm that their restrictions on direct shipments by out-of-state wineries passed muster under Dormant Commerce Clause principles because they advanced two legitimate local purposes: “keeping alcohol out of the hands of minors and facilitating tax collection.”<sup>23</sup> The Supreme Court rejected these claims, concluding that there was insufficient evidence to show that prohibiting direct shipments would solve either of these problems.<sup>24</sup> The Taylor*, 477 U.S. 131, 138 (1986) (once discrimination against interstate commerce is established, “the burden falls on the State to demonstrate both that the statute ‘serves a legitimate local purpose,’ and that this purpose could not be served as well by available nondiscriminatory means”) (quoting *Hughes v. Court also suggested that the states could achieve “their regulatory objectives . . . without discriminating against interstate commerce.”<sup>25</sup>

The Court struck down another discriminatory regulation in Tennessee Wine and Spirits Retailers Association v. Thomas.<sup>26</sup> In that case, the Court considered specific aspects of Tennessee’s three-tier system.<sup>27</sup> In particular, Tennessee would only issue new retail licenses to individuals who had been residents of the state for the previous two years.<sup>28</sup> In defense of the law, a trade association representing Tennessee liquor stores argued that the case was not governed by Granholm.<sup>29</sup> In its view, Granholm’s analysis was limited to laws that discriminate against out-of-state products and producers, whereas Tennessee’s provision concerned “the licensing of domestic retail alcohol stores.”<sup>30</sup> The Court disagreed, explaining that instead, Granholm established that the Constitution “prohibits state discrimination against all ‘out-of-state economic interests.’”<sup>31</sup>

Ultimately, the Court concluded in Tennessee Wine that the challenged law was unconstitutional because its predominant effect was protectionism, saying that the law had “at best a highly attenuated relationship to public health or safety.”<sup>32</sup> The trade association argued that the provision was justified because it made retailers “amenable to the direct process of state courts,” allowed the state “to determine an applicant’s fitness to sell alcohol,” and “promote[d] responsible alcohol consumption.”<sup>33</sup> But in the Court’s view, there was no “concrete evidence’ showing that the two-year residency requirement actually promotes public health or safety; nor [was] there evidence that nondiscriminatory alternatives would be insufficient to further those interests.”<sup>34</sup>

When passing upon the constitutionality of legislation regulating the carriage of liquor interstate, a majority of the Justices seemed disposed to bypass the Twenty-First Amendment and to resolve the issue exclusively in terms of the Commerce Clause and state power. This trend toward devaluation of the Twenty-First Amendment was set in motion by Ziffrin, Inc. v. Reeves<sup>35</sup> in which a Kentucky statute that prohibited the transportation of intoxicating liquors by carriers other than licensed common carriers was enforced as to an Indiana corporation engaged in delivering liquor obtained from Kentucky distillers to consignees in Illinois but licensed only as a contract carrier under the Federal Motor Carriers Act. After acknowledging that “the Twenty-first Amendment sanctions the right of a State to legislate concerning <sup>31</sup> Id. at 27 (quoting Granholm v. Heald, 544 U.S. 460, 472 (2005)). The Court also characterized the association’s reading of the Twenty-First Amendment as “implausible.” Id. While the association conceded that Section 2 of the Twenty-First Amendment could not shield discriminatory laws that address the importation of alcohol, it argued that Section 2 authorized its discriminatory law regarding licensing domestic stores. Id. The Court noted that the Twenty-First Amendment specifically prohibits the “importation” of alcohol into a state in violation of that state’s laws, but does not literally address states’ ability to license domestic retailers. Id. The majority argued that “if § 2 granted States the power to discriminate in the field of alcohol regulation, that power would be at its apex when it comes to regulating the activity to which the provision expressly refers.” Id. at 26–27. But because Section 2 did not shield importation laws from analysis under the Dormant Commerce Clause, the Court reasoned that it would be odd for the provision to nonetheless protect other types of discriminatory regulations. Id.

intoxicating liquors brought from without, unfettered by the Commerce Clause,<sup>36</sup> the Court proceeded to found its ruling largely upon decisions antedating the Amendment that sustained similar state regulations as a legitimate exercise of the police power not unduly burdening interstate commerce. In light of the contemporaneous cases enumerated in the preceding topic construing the Twenty-First Amendment as according a plenary power to the states, such extended emphasis on the police power and the Commerce Clause would seem to have been unnecessary. Thereafter, a total eclipse of the Twenty-First Amendment was recorded in Duckworth v. Arkansas<sup>37</sup> and Carter v. Virginia,<sup>38</sup> in which, without even considering that Amendment, a majority of the Court upheld, as not contravening the Commerce Clause, statutes regulating the transport through the state of liquor cargoes originating and ending outside the regulating state's boundaries.<sup>39</sup>

Amdt21.S2.2 State Regulation of Imports Destined for a Federal Area

Twenty-First Amendment, Section 2:

The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Importation of alcoholic beverages into a state for ultimate delivery at a National Park located in the state but over which the United States retained exclusive jurisdiction has been construed as not constituting “transportation . . . into [a] State for delivery and use therein” within the meaning of Section 2 of the Amendment. The importation having had as its objective delivery and use in a federal area over which the state retained no jurisdiction, the increased powers that the state acquired from the Twenty-First Amendment were declared to be inapplicable. California therefore could not extend the importation license and other regulatory requirements of its Alcoholic Beverage Control Act to a retail liquor dealer doing business in the Park.<sup>1</sup> On the other hand, a state may apply nondiscriminatory liquor regulations to sales at federal enclaves under concurrent federal and state jurisdiction, and may require that liquor sold at such federal enclaves be labeled as being restricted for use only within the enclave.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>39</sup> Arkansas required a permit for the transportation of liquor across its territory, but granted the same upon application and payment of a nominal fee. Virginia required carriers engaged in similar through-shipments to use the most direct route, carry a bill of lading describing that route, and post a $1,000 bond conditioned on lawful transportation; and also stipulated that the true consignee be named in the bill of lading and be one having the legal right to receive the shipment at destination.

<sup>1</sup> Collins v. Yosemite Park Co., 304 U.S. 518, 537–38 (1938). The principle was reaffirmed in United States v. Mississippi Tax Comm'n, 412 U.S. 363 (1973), holding that Mississippi could not apply its tax regulations to liquor sold to military officers' clubs and other nonappropriated fund activities located on bases within the State and over which the United States had obtained exclusive jurisdiction. “[A]bsent an appropriate express reservation . . . the Twenty-first Amendment confers no power on a State to regulate—whether by licensing, taxation, or otherwise—the importation of distilled spirits into territory over which the United States exercises exclusive jurisdiction.” Id. at 375. Nor may states tax importation of liquor for sale at bases over which the United States exercises concurrent jurisdiction only. United States v. Mississippi Tax Comm'n, 421 U.S. 599 (1975).

Sec. 2—Importation, Transportation, and Sale of Liquor

Imports, Exports, and Foreign Commerce

Amdt21.S2.3 Imports, Exports, and Foreign Commerce

Twenty-First Amendment, Section 2:

The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

The Twenty-First Amendment did not repeal the Export-Import Clause, Article I, Section 10, Clause 2, nor obliterate the Commerce Clause, Article I, Section 8, Clause 3. Accordingly, a state cannot tax imported liquor while it remains “in unbroken packages in the hands of the original importer and prior to [his] resale or use” thereof.<sup>1</sup> Likewise, New York is precluded from terminating the business of an airport dealer who, under sanction of federal customs laws, acquired “tax-free liquors for export” from out-of-state sources for resale exclusively to airline passengers, with delivery deferred until the latter arrive at foreign destinations.<sup>2</sup> “The Commerce Clause operates with full force whenever one State attempts to regulate the transportation and sale of alcoholic beverages destined for distribution and consumption in a foreign country . . . or another State.”<sup>3</sup>

Amdt21.S2.4 Effect of Section 2 upon Other Constitutional Provisions

Twenty-First Amendment, Section 2:

The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

Notwithstanding the 1936 assertion that “[a] classification recognized by the Twenty-first Amendment cannot be deemed forbidden by the Fourteenth,”<sup>1</sup> the Court has now in a series of cases acknowledged that Section 2 of the Twenty-First Amendment did not repeal provisions of the Constitution adopted before ratification of the Twenty-First, save for the severe cabining of Commerce Clause application to the liquor traffic, but it has formulated no consistent rationale for a determination of the effect of the later provision upon earlier ones. In Craig v. Boren,<sup>2</sup> the Court invalidated a state law that prescribed different minimum drinking ages for men and women as violating the Equal Protection Clause. To the state’s Twenty-First Amendment argument, the Court replied that the Amendment “primarily created an exception to the normal operation of the Commerce Clause” and that its “relevance . . . to other constitutional provisions” is doubtful. “Neither the text nor the history of the Twenty-first Amendment suggests that it qualifies individual rights protected by the Bill of Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment where the sale or use of liquor is concerned.”<sup>3</sup> The holding on this point is “that the operation of the Twenty-First Amendment does not alter the application of

Neither distinguishing element, of course, addresses the precise language quoted. the equal protection standards that would otherwise govern this case.”<sup>4</sup> Other decisions reach the same result but without discussing the application of the Amendment.<sup>5</sup> Similarly, a state “may not exercise its power under the Twenty-first Amendment in a way which impinges upon the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment.”<sup>6</sup>

The Court departed from this line of reasoning in California v. LaRue,<sup>7</sup> in which it sustained the facial constitutionality of regulations barring a lengthy list of actual or simulated sexual activities and motion picture portrayals of these activities in establishments licensed to sell liquor by the drink. In an action attacking the validity of the regulations as applied to ban nude dancing in bars, the Court considered at some length the material adduced at the public hearings which resulted in the rules demonstrating the anti-social consequences of the activities in the bars. It conceded that the regulations reached expression that would not be deemed legally obscene under prevailing standards and reached expressive conduct that would not be prohibitible under prevailing standards,<sup>8</sup> but the Court thought that the constitutional protection of conduct that partakes “more of gross sexuality than of communication” was outweighed by the state’s interest in maintaining order and decency. Moreover, the Court continued, the second section of the Twenty-First Amendment gave an “added presumption in favor of the validity” of the regulations as applied to prohibit questioned activities in places serving liquor by the drink.<sup>9</sup>

A much broader ruling resulted when the Court considered the constitutionality of a state regulation banning topless dancing in bars. “Pursuant to its power to regulate the sale of liquor within its boundaries, it has banned topless dancing in establishments granted a license to serve liquor. The State’s power to ban the sale of alcoholic beverages entirely includes the lesser power to ban the sale of liquor on premises where topless dancing occurs.”<sup>10</sup> This recurrence to the greater-includes-the-lesser-power argument, relatively rare in recent years,<sup>11</sup> would if it were broadly applied give the states in the area of regulation of alcoholic beverages a review-free discretion of unknown scope.

In 44 Liquormart, Inc. v. Rhode Island,<sup>12</sup> the Court disavowed LaRue and Bellanca, and reaffirmed that, “although the Twenty-first Amendment limits the effect of the Dormant

Sec. 2—Importation, Transportation, and Sale of Liquor

Amdt21.S2.4

Effect of Section 2 upon Other Constitutional Provisions

---

Commerce Clause on a state's regulatory power over the delivery or use of intoxicating beverages within its borders, 'the Amendment does not license the States to ignore their obligations under other provisions of the Constitution,'"<sup>13</sup> and therefore does not afford a basis for state legislation infringing freedom of expression protected by the First Amendment. There is no reason, the Court asserted, for distinguishing between freedom of expression and the other constitutional guarantees (for example, those protected by the Establishment and Equal Protection Clauses) held to be insulated from state impairment pursuant to powers conferred by the Twenty-First Amendment. The Court hastened to add by way of dictum that states retain adequate police powers to regulate "grossly sexual exhibitions in premises licensed to serve alcoholic beverages." "Entirely apart from the Twenty-first Amendment, the State has ample power to prohibit the sale of alcoholic beverages in inappropriate locations."<sup>14</sup>

Amdt21.S2.5 Effect on Federal Regulation

Twenty-First Amendment, Section 2:

The transportation or importation into any State, Territory, or possession of the United States for delivery or use therein of intoxicating liquors, in violation of the laws thereof, is hereby prohibited.

The Twenty-First Amendment does not oust all federal regulatory power affecting transportation or sale of alcoholic beverages. Thus, the Court held, the Amendment does not bar a prosecution under the Sherman Antitrust Act of producers, wholesalers, and retailers charged with conspiring to fix and maintain retail prices of alcoholic beverages in Colorado.<sup>1</sup> In a concurring opinion, supported by Justice Owen Roberts, Justice Felix Frankfurter took the position that if the State of Colorado had in fact "authorized the transactions here complained of, the Sherman Law could not override such exercise of state power. . . . [Because] the Sherman Law . . . can have no greater potency than the Commerce Clause itself, it must equally yield to state power drawn from the Twenty-first Amendment."<sup>2</sup>

Following a review of the cases in this area, the Court has observed "that there is no bright line between federal and state powers over liquor. The Twenty-first Amendment grants the States virtually complete control over whether to permit importation or sale of liquor and how to structure the liquor distribution system. Although States retain substantial discretion to establish other liquor regulations, those controls may be subject to the federal commerce power in appropriate situations. The competing state and federal interests can be reconciled only after careful scrutiny of those concerns in a 'concrete case.'"<sup>3</sup> Invalidating under the Sherman Act a state fair trade-scheme imposing a resale price maintenance policy for wine, the Court balanced the federal interest in free enterprise expressed through the antitrust laws against the asserted state interests in promoting temperance and orderly marketing conditions. Because the state courts had found that the policy under attack promoted neither interest significantly, the Supreme Court experienced no difficulty in concluding that the federal interest prevailed. Whether more substantial state interests or means more suited to promoting the state interests would survive attack under federal legislation must await further litigation.

TWENTY-SECOND AMENDMENT—PRESIDENTIAL TERM LIMITS

Amdt22.1 Overview of Twenty-Second Amendment, Presidential Term Limits

Twenty-Second Amendment

Section 1:

No person shall be elected to the office of the President more than twice, and no person who has held the office of President, or acted as President, for more than two years of a term to which some other person was elected President shall be elected to the office of the President more than once. But this Article shall not apply to any person holding the office of President when this Article was proposed by the Congress, and shall not prevent any person who may be holding the office of President, or acting as President, during the term within which this Article becomes operative from holding the office of President or acting as President during the remainder of such term.

Section 2:

This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission to the States by the Congress.

Ratified in 1951, the Twenty-Second Amendment limits persons to being elected only twice to the presidency. As a House Report noted in 1947:

By reason of the lack of a positive expression upon the subject of the tenure of the office of President, and by reason of a well-defined custom which has risen in the past that no President should have more than two terms in that office, much discussion has resulted upon this subject. Hence it is the purpose of this . . . [proposal] . . . to submit this question to the people so they, by and through the recognized processes, may express their views upon this question, and if they shall so elect, they may . . . thereby set at rest this problem.<sup>1</sup>

This characterization of the issue followed soon after the people had elected Franklin D. Roosevelt to unprecedented third and fourth terms of office, in 1940 and 1944, respectively.

The Twenty-Second Amendment has yet to be applied. Commentary suggests, however, that a number of issues could be raised as to the Twenty-Second Amendment's meaning and application, especially in relation to the Twelfth Amendment. By its terms, the Twenty-Second Amendment bars only the election of two-term Presidents, and this prohibition would not prevent someone who had twice been elected President from succeeding to the office after having been elected or appointed Vice President. Broader language providing that no such person "shall be chosen or serve as President . . . or be eligible to hold the office" was rejected in favor of the Twenty-Second Amendment's ban merely on election.<sup>2</sup> Whether a two-term President could be elected or appointed Vice President depends upon the meaning of the Twelfth Amendment, which provides that "no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President." Is someone prohibited by the Twenty-Second Amendment from being "elected" to the office of President thereby "constitutionally ineligible to the office?" Note also that neither Amendment addresses the

TWENTY-THIRD AMENDMENT—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ELECTORS

Amdt23.1 Overview of Twenty-Third Amendment, District of Columbia Electors

Twenty-Third Amendment

Section 1:

The District constituting the seat of Government of the United States shall appoint in such manner as the Congress may direct:

A number of electors of President and Vice President equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives in Congress to which the District would be entitled if it were a State, but in no event more than the least populous State; they shall be in addition to those appointed by the States, but they shall be considered, for the purposes of the election of President and Vice President, to be electors appointed by a State; and they shall meet in the District and perform such duties as provided by the twelfth article of amendment.

Section 2:

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

House Report No. 1698 discussed the Twenty-Third Amendment, stating that it would:

provide the citizens of the District of Columbia with appropriate rights of voting in national elections for President and Vice President of the United States. It would permit District citizens to elect Presidential electors who would be in addition to the electors from the States and who would participate in electing the President and Vice President.

[This] . . . amendment would change the Constitution only to the minimum extent necessary to give the District appropriate participation in national elections. It would not make the District of Columbia a State. It would not give the District of Columbia any other attributes of a State or change the constitutional powers of the Congress to legislate with respect to the District of Columbia and to prescribe its form of government. . . . It would, however, perpetuate recognition of the unique status of the District as the seat of Federal Government under the exclusive legislative control of Congress.<sup>1</sup>

TWENTY-FOURTH AMENDMENT—ABOLITION OF POLL TAX

Amdt24.1 Overview of Twenty-Fourth Amendment, Abolition of Poll Tax

Ratification of the Twenty-Fourth Amendment in 1964 marked the culmination of an endeavor begun in Congress in 1939 to eliminate the poll tax as a qualification for voting in federal elections. Property qualifications extend back to colonial days, but the poll tax itself as a qualification was instituted in eleven states of the South following the end of Reconstruction, although at the time of the ratification of this Amendment only five states still retained it.<sup>1</sup> Congress viewed the qualification as “an obstacle to the proper exercise of a citizen’s franchise” and expected its removal to “provide a more direct approach to participation by more of the people in their government.” Congress similarly thought that a constitutional amendment was necessary,<sup>2</sup> because the qualifications had previously survived constitutional challenges on several grounds.<sup>3</sup>

Amdt24.2 Doctrine on Abolition of Poll Tax

Twenty-Fourth Amendment, Section 1:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote in any primary or other election for President or Vice President, for electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Representative in Congress, shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State by reason of failure to pay any poll tax or other tax.

Twenty-Fourth Amendment, Section 2:

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Not long after ratification of the Amendment—applicable only to federal elections—Congress by statute authorized the Attorney General to seek injunctive relief against use of the poll tax as a means of racial discrimination in state elections,<sup>1</sup> and the Supreme Court held that the poll tax discriminated on the basis of wealth in violation of the Equal Protection Clause.<sup>2</sup>

In Harman v. Forssenius,<sup>3</sup> the Court struck down a Virginia statute that eliminated the poll tax as an absolute qualification for voting in federal elections and gave federal voters the choice either of paying the tax or of filing a certificate of residence six months before the election. Viewing the latter requirement as imposing upon voters in federal elections an onerous requirement that was not imposed on those who continued to pay the tax, the Court unanimously held the law to conflict with the new Amendment by penalizing those who chose to exercise a right guaranteed them by the Amendment.

TWENTY-FIFTH AMENDMENT—PRESIDENTIAL VACANCY

Amdt25.1 Overview of Twenty-Fifth Amendment, Presidential Vacancy

Twenty-Fifth Amendment

Section 1:

In case of the removal of the President from office or of his death or resignation, the Vice President shall become President.

Section 2:

Whenever there is a vacancy in the office of the Vice President, the President shall nominate a Vice President who shall take office upon confirmation by a majority vote of both Houses of Congress.

Section 3:

Whenever the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that he is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, and until he transmits to them a written declaration to the contrary, such powers and duties shall be discharged by the Vice President as Acting President.

Section 4:

Whenever the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive departments or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall immediately assume the powers and duties of the office as Acting President.

Thereafter, when the President transmits to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives his written declaration that no inability exists, he shall resume the powers and duties of his office unless the Vice President and a majority of either the principal officers of the executive department or of such other body as Congress may by law provide, transmit within four days to the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives their written declaration that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office. Thereupon Congress shall decide the issue, assembling within forty-eight hours for that purpose if not in session. If the Congress, within twenty-one days after receipt of the latter written declaration, or, if Congress is not in session, within twenty-one days after Congress is required to assemble, determines by two-thirds vote of both Houses that the President is unable to discharge the powers and duties of his office, the Vice President shall continue to discharge the same as Acting President; otherwise, the President shall resume the powers and duties of his office.

The Twenty-Fifth Amendment was an effort to resolve some of the continuing issues revolving about the office of the President; that is, what happens upon the death, removal, or resignation of the President and what is the course to follow if for some reason the President becomes disabled to such a degree that he cannot fulfill his responsibilities. The practice had been well established that the Vice President became President upon the death of the President, as had happened eight times in our history. Presumably, the Vice President would become President upon the removal of the President from office. Whether the Vice President would become acting President when the President became unable to carry on and whether the President could resume his office upon his recovering his ability were two questions that had divided scholars and experts. Also, seven Vice Presidents had died in office and one had resigned, so that for some 20% of United States history there had been no Vice President to step up. But the seemingly most insoluble problem was that of presidential inability—James Garfield’s lying in a coma for eighty days before succumbing to the effects of an assassin’s bullet, Woodrow Wilson an invalid for the last eighteen months of his term, the result of a stroke—with its unanswered questions: who was to determine the existence of an inability, how was the matter to be handled if the President sought to continue, in what manner should the Vice President act, would he be acting President or President, what was to happen if the President recovered. Congress finally proposed this Amendment to the states in the aftermath of President John F. Kennedy’s assassination, with the Vice Presidency vacant and a President who had previously had a heart attack.

The Amendment was invoked during the 1970s and resulted for the first time in our history in the accession to the Presidency and Vice-Presidency of two men who had not faced the voters in a national election. First, Vice President Spiro Agnew resigned on October 10, 1973, and President Richard M. Nixon nominated Gerald R. Ford to succeed him, following the procedures of § 2 of the Amendment for the first time. Hearings were held upon the nomination by the Senate Rules Committee and the House Judiciary Committee, both Houses thereafter confirmed the nomination, and the new Vice President took the oath of office December 6, 1973. Second, President Nixon resigned his office August 9, 1974, and Vice President Ford immediately succeeded to the office and took the presidential oath of office at noon of the same day. Third, again following Section 2 of the Amendment, President Ford nominated Nelson A. Rockefeller to be Vice President; on August 20, 1974, hearings were held in both Houses, confirmation voted, and Rockefeller took the oath of office December 19, 1974.<sup>1</sup>

TWENTY-SIXTH AMENDMENT—REDUCTION OF VOTING AGE

Amdt26.1 Overview of Twenty-Sixth Amendment, Reduction of Voting Age

Twenty-Sixth Amendment

Section 1:

The right of citizens of the United States, who are eighteen years of age or older, to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of age.

Section 2:

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

In extending the Voting Rights Act of 1965 in 1970,<sup>1</sup> Congress included a provision lowering the age qualification to vote in all elections, federal, state, and local, to eighteen.<sup>2</sup> In a divided decision, the Supreme Court held that Congress was empowered to lower the age qualification in federal elections, but voided the application of the provision in all other elections as beyond congressional power.<sup>3</sup> Confronted thus with the possibility that they might have to maintain two sets of registration books and go to the expense of running separate election systems for federal elections and for all other elections, the states were receptive to the proposing of an Amendment by Congress to establish a minimum age qualification at eighteen for all elections, and ratified it promptly.<sup>4</sup>

TWENTY-SEVENTH AMENDMENT—CONGRESSIONAL COMPENSATION

Amdt27.1 Overview of Twenty-Seventh Amendment, Congressional Compensation

Twenty-Seventh Amendment:

No law, varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives, shall take effect, until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Referred to the state legislatures at the same time as those proposals that eventually became the Bill of Rights, the Congressional Pay Amendment had long been assumed to be dead.<sup>1</sup> This provision had its genesis, as did several others of the first amendments, in the petitions of the states ratifying the Constitution.<sup>2</sup> It was ratified, however, by only six states (of the eleven needed), and it was rejected by five states. Aside from the idiosyncratic action of the Ohio legislature in 1873, which ratified the proposal in protest of a controversial pay increase adopted by Congress, the pay limitation provision lay dormant until the 1980s. Then, an aide to a Texas legislator discovered the proposal and began a crusade that culminated some ten years later in its ratification.<sup>3</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Indeed, in Dillon v. Gloss, 256 U.S. 368, 375 (1921), the Court, albeit in dictum, observed that, unless the inference was drawn that ratification must occur within some reasonable time of proposal, “four amendments proposed long ago—two in 1789, one in 1810 and one in 1861—are still pending and in a situation where their ratification in some of the States many years since by representatives of generations now largely forgotten may be effectively supplemented in enough more States to make three-fourths by representatives of the present or some future generation. To that view few would be able to subscribe, and in our opinion it is quite untenable.” (Emphasis supplied).

<sup>2</sup> A comprehensive, scholarly treatment of the background, development, failure, and subsequent success of this Amendment is Richard Bernstein, The Sleeper Wakes: The History and Legacy of the Twenty-Seventh Amendment, 61 FORD. L. REV. 497 (1992). A briefer account is The Congressional Pay Amendment, 16 Ops. of the Office of Legal Counsel, U.S. Dept. of Justice 102, App. at 127–136 (1992) (prelim. pr.).

Appx.1.1 Constitution Annotated Tables Generally

The following essays provide background on and explanations of the methodologies used to compile the tables in the Resources section of the Constitution Annotated website. These tables include the “Table of Supreme Court Decisions Overruled by Subsequent Decisions;”<sup>1</sup> the “Table of Laws Held Unconstitutional in Whole or in Part by the Supreme Court;”<sup>2</sup> the “Table of Supreme Court Justices;”<sup>3</sup> “Beyond the Constitution Annotated: Table of Additional Resources;”<sup>4</sup> and the “Table of Cases.”<sup>5</sup> The “Table of Supreme Court Decisions Overruled by Subsequent Decisions;” the “Table of Laws Held Unconstitutional in Whole or in Part by the Supreme Court;” the “Table of Supreme Court Justices;” and the “Table of Cases” are included in the 2022 edition of the Constitution Annotated. “Beyond the Constitution Annotated: Table of Additional Resources” is available online.

Appx.1.2 Methodology for the Table of Supreme Court Decisions Overruled by Subsequent Decisions

The Table of Supreme Court Decisions Overruled by Subsequent Decisions<sup>1</sup> lists Supreme Court decisions regarding an interpretation of constitutional law, which the Supreme Court subsequently overruled. In accordance with the underlying purposes of the Constitution Annotated, this list is intended to provide a consistent, objective assessment of changes in Court precedent. While Justices<sup>2</sup> and commentators<sup>3</sup> frequently assert in legal debates that a given decision has overruled a prior decision, such assertions may be speculative or reflect subjective interpretations, resulting in diverse opinions on whether a given case has, in fact, been overruled.<sup>4</sup> Oftentimes, knowledge of the Court's subsequent actions is necessary to determine whether and the extent to which a particular case can be said to have overturned precedent.<sup>5</sup>

In order to ensure that cases are identified as overruled in a consistent and objective manner, the Constitution Annotated adopted fixed criteria. Specifically, for a decision to be listed as overruled, a majority of the Court must have explicitly stated, in a subsequent decision, that the case has been overruled<sup>6</sup> or used language that is functionally equivalent.<sup>7</sup> While this approach may result in a list that is narrower than similar lists in other sources, it provides consistent and objective treatment, adhering to the Court's repeated statements that only the High Court has "the prerogative of overruling its own decisions."<sup>8</sup>

The table also includes decisions that the Court has only partially overruled or otherwise qualified. For example, in United States v. Hatter, the Court overruled Evans v. Gore "insofar as [Evans] holds that the Compensation Clause forbids Congress to apply a generally applicable, nondiscriminatory tax to the salaries of federal judges, whether or not they were appointed before enactment of the tax."<sup>9</sup> Similarly, in Fulton Corp. v. Faulkner, the Court distinguished an earlier decision's treatment of the Equal Protection and Commerce Clauses, stating: "To the extent that Darnell evaluated a discriminatory state tax under the Equal Protection Clause, time simply has passed it by . . . [W]hile cases like Kidd and Darnell may still be authorities under the Equal Protection Clause, they are no longer good law under the Commerce Clause."<sup>10</sup>

<sup>4</sup> See Matthew Berns, Trigger Laws, 97 GEO. L.J. 1639, 1672 (2009) ("Whether the Supreme Court has overruled itself is a difficult question that often lacks a clear 'yes' or 'no' answer, and an opinion might be consistent or inconsistent with an earlier decision on a number of different levels.").

<sup>5</sup> Compare Webster v. Reprod. Health Servs., 492 U.S. 490, 537 (1989) (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (arguing that a majority of the Court had functionally overruled Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973) ) with Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 923 (1992) (Blackmun, J., dissenting) (noting that a majority of the Court had concluded that the "essential holding of Roe v. Wade should be retained and once again reaffirmed.").

<sup>6</sup> See, e.g., United States v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56, 66 (1950) ("To the extent that Trupiano v. United States . . . requires a search warrant solely upon the basis of the practicability of procuring it rather than upon the reasonableness of the search after a lawful arrest, that case is overruled."); Brenham v. German Am. Bank, 144 U.S. 173, 187 (1892) ("We, therefore, must regard the cases of Rogers v. Burlington and Mitchell v. Burlington, as overruled in the particular referred to, by later cases in this court.").

<sup>7</sup> See, e.g., Joseph Burstyn, Inc. v. Wilson, 343 U.S. 495, 502 (1952) ("For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that expression by means of motion pictures is included within the free speech and free press guaranty of the First and Fourteenth Amendments. To the extent that language in the opinion in Mutual Film Corp. v. Industrial Comm'n . . . is out of harmony with the views here set forth, we no longer adhere to it."); Alpha Portland Cement Co. v. Massachusetts, 268 U.S. 203, 218 (1925) ("So far as the language of Baltic Mining Co. v. Massachusetts . . . tends to support a different view it conflicts with conclusions reached in later opinions and is now definitely disapproved."). While the "functional equivalent" standard invites judgment calls about whether a case should be included, at a minimum, the majority opinion must discuss the case being overturned and have some clear language indicating the court is rejecting some principle announced in the earlier case to be included in the table.

Finding Ford inconsistent with the basic rationale of that line of cases, we consequently overrule Ford insofar as it would otherwise apply.").

Appx.1.2

Methodology for the Table of Supreme Court Decisions Overruled by Subsequent Decisions

---

This approach necessarily excludes certain cases that other sources may list as overruled. For example, the table does not include cases that the Court distinguished or limited<sup>11</sup> or cases identified by concurring or dissenting Justices or commentators as overruled,<sup>12</sup> unless such cases have also been expressly overruled by a majority of the Court. Similarly, cases that the Court treats as discredited, but has not expressly overruled, are not included in the table.<sup>13</sup> In addition, in order to avoid imputing findings to the Court with respect to particular cases, the table does not include cases that, arguably, rely on overruled precedent, unless the Court has also expressly identified such cases as overruled.

The table does not include cases where the Court issued a ruling on the merits after having split evenly on the issue previously,<sup>14</sup> or where the Court reversed an earlier procedural ruling (e.g., lifting a previously issued stay).<sup>15</sup> While some sources list such cases,<sup>16</sup> the Constitution Annotated does not. The table also does not address subsequent developments, such as the enactment of statutory or constitutional amendments, which may functionally “reverse” the Court’s decisions.<sup>17</sup> In other words, the table focuses on the Supreme Court’s actions and, in particular, the frequency and manner in which the Court has reversed itself. As such, the table does not necessarily reflect the current state of the law on a given issue.

<sup>11</sup> See, e.g., United States v. Class, 313 U.S. 299, 317 (1941) (“In Newberry v. United States, . . . four Justices of this Court were of opinion that the term ‘elections’ in §4 of Article I did not embrace a primary election, since that procedure was unknown to the framers. A fifth Justice, who with them pronounced the judgment of the Court, was of opinion that a primary, held under a law enacted before the adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment, for the nomination of candidates for Senator, was not an election within the meaning of §4 of Article I of the Constitution, presumably because the choice of the primary imposed no legal restrictions on the election of Senators by the state legislatures to which their election had been committed by Article I, § 3. The remaining four Justices were of the opinion that a primary election for the choice of candidates for Senator or Representative were elections subject to regulation by Congress within the meaning of §4 of Article I. The question then has not been prejudged by any decision of this Court.”); In re Ayers, 123 U.S. 443 (1887) (distinguishing Osborn v. Bank of the United States, 22 U.S. (9 Wheat.) 738 (1824) ).

<sup>12</sup> See, e.g., Mitchell v. W.T. Grant Co., 416 U.S. 600, 634–35 (1974) (Stewart, J., dissenting) (“Yet the Court today has unmistakably overruled a considered decision of this Court that is barely two years old, without pointing to any change in either societal perceptions or basic constitutional understandings that might justify this total disregard of stare decisis.”); Berger v. New York, 388 U.S. 41, 64 (1967) (Douglas, J., concurring) (“I join the opinion of the Court because at long last it overrules sub silentio Olmstead v. United States . . . and its offspring and brings wiretapping and other electronic eavesdropping fully within the purview of the Fourth Amendment.”).

<sup>13</sup> In a few instances, this approach may have counterintuitive results, such as the list’s treatment of Plessy v. Ferguson. 163 U.S. 537 (1896). This 1896 decision, which held that the provision of “separate but equal” accommodations for African Americans does not run afoul of the constitutional guarantee of equal protection, is sometimes said to have been overruled by the Court’s 1954 decision in Brown v. Board of Education. 347 U.S. 483 (1954). However, Brown’s language is more limited, stating only that “We conclude that, in the field of public education, the doctrine of ‘separate but equal’ has no place,” (Id. at 495.) and distinguishing potentially conflicting case law as simply not addressing the ultimate holding in Brown, 347 U.S. at 491 (noting that “in Cumming v. County Board of Education, 175 U.S. 528 (1899), and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U.S. 78 (1927), the validity of the doctrine [of ‘separate but equal’ in public education] itself was not challenged.”). Instead, the list provides that Plessy was firmly repudiated by the Court in a much later case, Bob Jones University v. United States, 461 U.S. 574 (1983).

<sup>14</sup> Compare Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. v. Leitch, 276 U.S. 429 (1928) (rehearing), with Chesapeake & Ohio Ry. v. Leitch, 275 U.S. 507 (1927) (per curiam) (affirming the decision of the lower court by a vote of four votes to four votes).

<sup>17</sup> For example, the table lists the Court’s 1944 decision in United States v. South-Eastern Underwriters Association, 322 U.S. 533 (1944) as reversing its 1869 decision in Paul v. Virginia, 75 U.S. (8 Wall.) 168 (1869), without noting that Congress subsequently enacted the McCarran-Ferguson Act to exempt the business of insurance from most federal regulation, a law that negates Paul. See, e.g., Willy E. Rice, Federal Courts and the Regulation of the Insurance Industry: An Empirical and Historical Analysis of Courts’ Ineffectual Attempts to Harmonize Federal Antitrust, Arbitration, and Insolvency Statutes with the McCarran-Ferguson Act, 1941–1993, 43 CATH. U. L. REV. 399, 401 (1994) (“South-Eastern Underwriters effectively overruled Paul and created major turbulence within the insurance industry. Congress responded to the crisis by enacting the McCarran-Ferguson Act (the Act).”).

Appx.1.2

For purposes of this table, decisions are identified as overruling when the High Court characterizes them as such. While it is not uncommon for the Court to note that an earlier decision has been “eroded by . . . subsequent decisions,”<sup>18</sup> or “cannot be reconciled with later decisions of th[e] Court,”<sup>19</sup> cases that the Court may consider to have effectuated such “erosion” or legal change are not included in the table unless the Court expressly found such cases to overrule precedent.

Similarly, with overruled decisions, the table includes only decisions the Court has expressly identified as overruled. While the Court often refers to a decision by name when overruling it—stating, for example, “Haddock v. Haddock is overruled . . .,”<sup>20</sup> or “We now expressly overrule Spaziano and Hildwin . . .”<sup>21</sup>—in some cases, the Court may identify several decisions related to a particular legal doctrine and then state that the doctrine is overruled.<sup>22</sup> In such circumstances, cases that the Court expressly identifies in the overruling decision are listed, insofar as the overruling decision evidences that the Court contemplated such cases when deeming the doctrine overruled. Decisions that may rely on an overruled doctrine, but are not identified by the Court as such, are not listed in order to avoid imputing findings to the Court that it did not intend.

The table was compiled by searching the LEXIS database for all Supreme Court decisions that use the word “overrule” in the headnotes, syllabus, or text of the Court’s opinion.<sup>23</sup> The results were then reviewed to ascertain the Court’s exact meaning with respect to its earlier decisions. Decisions supported by a majority of the Court that expressly overruled an earlier decision or used functionally equivalent language were listed in the table. These findings were also cross-checked with other sources to ensure that the search had captured any relevant results.<sup>24</sup>

<sup>18</sup> Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 353 (1967) (“We conclude that the underpinnings of Olmstead and Goldman have been so eroded by our subsequent decisions that the “trespass” doctrine there enunciated can no longer be regarded as controlling.”).

<sup>19</sup> California v. Thompson, 313 U.S. 109, 116 (1941) (“The decision in the Di Santo case was a departure from this principle which has been recognized since Cooley v. Board of Port Wardens . . . It cannot be reconciled with later decisions of this Court which have likewise recognized and applied the principle, and it can no longer be regarded as controlling authority.”).

<sup>22</sup> See, e.g., Pennhurst State Sch. & Hosp. v. Halderman, 465 U.S. 89, 114–15 (1984) (“The dissent in Larson made many of the arguments advanced by Justice Stevens[] dissent today, and asserted that many of the same cases were being overruled or ignored. Those arguments were rejected, and the cases supporting them are moribund. Since Larson was decided in 1949, no opinion by any Member of this Court has cited the cases on which the dissent primarily relies for a proposition as broad as the language the dissent quotes. Many if not most of these cases have not been relied upon in an Eleventh Amendment context at all.”); Elkins v. United States, 364 U.S. 206, 208 (1960) (“In a word, we re-examine here the validity of what has come to be called the silver platter doctrine. For the reasons that follow we conclude that this doctrine can no longer be accepted.”).

<sup>23</sup> This search strategy was selected because preliminary searches using other terms—including, but not limited to, “stare decisis”—suggest that the strategy previously noted would be effective in capturing decisions where the Court explicitly uses the word “overrule,” as well as decisions where the Court uses other express language that can be seen to be tantamount to overruling. See supra note 3.

APPENDIX AND RESOURCES

The table is arranged in chronological order by the date of the overruling decision. For each overruling decision listed, the table gives (1) the name of the overruling decision; (2) the date of the overruling decision; (3) the name of the overruled decision; and (4) the date of the overruled decision.

Appx.1.3 Methodology for the Table of Laws Held Unconstitutional in Whole or in Part by the Supreme Court

The Table of Laws Held Unconstitutional in Whole or in Part by the Supreme Court<sup>1</sup> is undergoing significant revisions and will be updated more fully as broader review of the Constitution Annotated continues. This table provides preliminary revisions to prior versions of the table, listing Supreme Court decisions that invalidated a law on constitutional grounds. It includes cases invalidating federal laws, state constitutional or statutory provisions, and local laws. The table does not include cases in which the Supreme Court held that a state or local law was preempted, as those cases tend to hinge on an interpretation of positive federal law as opposed to a substantive interpretation of a particular constitutional provision. Moreover, the table generally includes only cases in which the Court held that a statute was facially unconstitutional and does not include as-applied challenges. In addition to giving the case citations, the Table indicates the term in which the opinion was released, the opinion's author, and the general subject matter of the case. The table also briefly summarizes the law that was held unconstitutional and identifies what portion of the U.S. Constitution the law violated.

Appx.1.4 Methodology for the Table of Supreme Court Justices

The Table of Supreme Court Justices<sup>1</sup> lists all Supreme Court Justices along with brief biographical information (Supreme Court Term Start and End, Appointing President, and Noteworthy Opinions). The “Supreme Court Term Start” is the date on which the Justice was sworn in, including recess appointments.<sup>2</sup> The “Supreme Court Term End” is the date on which the Justice stopped serving on the Court.<sup>3</sup> “Notable Opinion(s)” lists landmark cases authored by the Justice addressing constitutional law issues.<sup>4</sup>

1969	Goldberg v. Kelly, 397 U.S. 254 (1970)	BRENNAN, WILLIAM J.	Workers' Compensation & Social Security; Government Operations	State & Local
Constitutional Provision(s) Invoked: Fourteenth Amendment  Constitutional Clause(s) Invoked: Due Process Clause  Description of Unconstitutional Provision(s): 18 CRR-NY 351.26(b): The New York City Department of Social Services promulgated Procedure No. 68-18, which halted aid immediately after the reviewing official affirmed the determination of ineligibility. The applicant was then notified of their ineligibility for welfare via a letter and not provided the opportunity to be heard prior to the termination of aid.
1969	In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)	BRENNAN, WILLIAM J.	Criminal Law & Procedure	State & Local
Constitutional Provision(s) Invoked: Fourteenth Amendment  Constitutional Clause(s) Invoked: Due Process Clause  Description of Unconstitutional Provision(s): N.Y. Family Court Act § 744(b): A New York statute that provided for a finding of guilt by preponderance of the evidence for an act that, if done by an adult, would have constituted the crime of larceny.
1969	Hadley v. Junior College District, 397 U.S. 50 (1970)	BLACK, HUGO L.	Elections	State & Local
Constitutional Provision(s) Invoked: Fourteenth Amendment  Constitutional Clause(s) Invoked: Equal Protection Clause  Description of Unconstitutional Provision(s): Mo. Rev. Stat. § 178.20 (Cum. Supp. 1967): A Missouri statute setting out how trustees are to be apportioned among the separate school districts. Briefly, the statutes provides that: if no one or more of the component school districts has [33.33%] or more of the total enumeration of the junior college district, then all six trustees are elected at large. If, however, one or more districts has between [33.33%] and 50% of the total enumeration, each such district elects two trustees and the rest are elected at large from the remaining districts. Similarly, if one district has between 50% and [66.66%] of the enumeration it elects three trustees, and if one district has more than [66.66%] it elects four trustees." Therefore, the statute "necessarily results in a systematic discrimination against voters in more populous school districts because whenever a large district's percentage of the total enumeration falls within a certain percentage range it is always allocated the number of trustees corresponding to the bottom of that range." Moreover, "unless a particular large district has exactly [33.33%], 50%, or [66.66%] of the total enumeration it will always have proportionally fewer trustees than the small districts."

TABLE OF LAWS HELD UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Supreme Court October Term	Case	Author(s) of Main Opinion	Subject Matter(s)	Federal or State Provision(s)
1969	Schacht v. United States, 398 U.S. 58 (1970)	BLACK, HUGO L.	Military & Veterans	Federal
Constitutional Provision(s) Invoked: First Amendment  Constitutional Clause(s) Invoked: Free Speech Clause  Description of Unconstitutional Provision(s): 10 U.S.C. § 772(f): This provision of the U.S. Code states: "While portraying a member of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps, an actor in a theatrical or motion-picture production may wear the uniform of that armed force if the portrayal does not tend to discredit that armed force." The Court limited their holding to the emphasized portion, striking it as unconstitutional. The Court reasoned that, when this portion of § 772(f) is read together with 18 U.S.C. § 702, which made it a crime for any person without authority to wear any uniform of the United States military, the effect is a violation of an actor's constitutional right "to say things that tend to bring the military into discredit or disrepute."
