Eridu (continuação)

- Na Mesopotâmia, os templos são a casa dos deuses. Eridu é, portanto, a moradia, ou a primeira cidade, a casa de Enki ou Abzu, as águas primárias são conhecidas.
- Há poucos registros nesta altura pelo que os povos menores de construção do período aumentam a população, e diferencia-se a mesma.
- Surgem também as primeiras casas construídas com tijolos de forno e a cerveja, base de alimentação desta cultura, através da indústria de fornos suficientemente quentes que ainda mais tarde permitem que se comece a trabalhar metais como o cobre / bronze.
- Técnicas de irrigação tornaram-se cada vez mais avançadas, suscitando a criação de leis próprias na altura, nomeadamente para regular inundações em terrenos vizinhos.

Embora tenham surgido desenvolvimentos fundamentais, também não houve retrocessos para um estilo de vida rector; no entanto, não foi um processo totalmente linear. Houve comunidades e economias e desenvolvimentos alternativos, que continuaram o modelo de rector.

- A dieta tornou-se menos variada e mais pobre, muito à base de cereais. O trabalho no campo implicou muito trabalho e criou uma grande dependência na qualidade da colheita e o sucesso do ano agrícola.
- Por outro lado há um aumento da mortalidade, pois a agricultura é mais apta à propagação de doenças infecciosas.
- Passamos para uma cidade que se afirma em laços de especialização e de dependência forte e organizada, que acaba por exercer influência sobre povos vizinhos em redor.
- Existência de templo monumental e excedentes agrícolas.
- Desenvolvimentos similares em escala menor: Eridu.
